SCIENCE ON A SHOESTRING

CSIRO physicist, Catherine Foley, last week visited the University to lecture on "Nitrides — the other III-IV Compounds", the subject of her doctoral thesis. She claims that doing R and D work in Australia forces you to become an expert 'shoestring' scientist because there are so few grants available. She was attracted to work on these particular semi-conductors, she says — only somewhat tongue-in-cheek — because nitrogen is free!

Dr Foley is now working on glassy metals as a post-doctoral fellow at the National Measurements Laboratory at Lindfield. Before that, she worked at Oregon State University in Corvallis, U.S.A. She recommends a career as a physicist to anyone who enjoys travel. As Vice-President of Sydney S.A.N.A., too, she finds herself in demand at various venues.

Cathy was to be presented with her doctorate on the day after her lecture at Wollongong. She had just finished 'starring' in a film made by the CSIRO, aimed at showing girls that a career in science is worthwhile and will not turn them into freaks! Listening to Dr Foley's lecture, which was quite comprehensible, even to a lay person, and watching her obvious enthusiasm for her work, was equally convincing.

PREMIER'S LITERARY AWARD: WOLLONGONG CONNECTION

Sydney author, Rosa Cappiello, who was Wollongong University's first "ethnic" writer-in-residence, was awarded the NSW Ethnic Affairs Commission's Ethnic Book Award (one of the Premier's Literary Awards granted annually) on 9 September for the English translation of her novel Paese fortunato (Oh Lucky Country). The translation was made by Gaetano Rando of the Department of European Languages and published in November of last year by Queensland University Press. The original Italian version was awarded the Calabria Prize for Literature in 1981. Since its publication the translated novel has received favourable reviews in the Australian national press and has been hailed as "a remarkable book which may well turn out to be a classic of migrant literature". The translation itself is considered to be a highly successful rendering of the "variety and complexity" of Cappiello's prose.

STANDISH OPENS CHINA CONFERENCE

Nick Standish, Associate Professor in Metallurgy, opened a major International Conference on Iron and Steel Making in China recently.

MIND OVER PHYSICS

Application for the scientific method to the exploration of mind and psychology is one of the themes of the next Geelong Lecture to be given by Professor Brian McCusker, former Professor of Physics at the University of Sydney.

Professor McCusker says that the new view of the universe, as one, whole, and indivisible, is radically different from the mid nineteenth century materialist view, which depended heavily on the physics expounded by Sir Isaac Newton.

'The new universe is seen as structured in various levels of consciousness, or being,' Professor McCusker said.

'The lowest level is that of matter. Physics is the science of this level. The next level is that of body: its science is biology, which includes physics, not vice versa.

'The next three levels are levels of mind and the science of psychology. This includes biology and physics.

'Physics, being the science of the lowest level was the easiest to comprehend, and so made progress first.

'The leading edge of science today would seem to be transpersonal psychology,' Professor McCusker said.

Professor McCusker presented his views in a lecture entitled 'The Failure of Realism and the Future of Science' given at Deakin University on September 11.

SCIENCE COMMUNICATORS FORMING PROFESSIONAL BODY, PLAN NATIONAL CONFERENCE

Specialists in the communication of science will form the nation's first professional body in the field, the Association of Science Communicators of Australia.

(A recent survey of science in the Australian media has revealed a substantial increase over the past year in the number of science specialists and of the outlets for their material).

The announcement of the formation of the Association coincided with the conclusion of the ANZAAS Congress at Monash University in Melbourne, where the science communicators held their inaugural meeting.

The membership of the Association will embrace specialists in the communication of science through all sections of the media, including press, radio, television and publishing.

A steering committee has been elected and working parties set up in four regions to organize the activities of the Association.

Some distinguished scientists, active themselves in communicating science to a wide audience, attended the inaugural meeting. It is intended to include scientists as members in order to forge closer understanding between research workers and mediators of their information and ideas.

"Science" is defined by the Association as covering technology and other science-related fields, as well as basic science.

In regional groupings the Association will run meetings which are professionally supportive for its members. The Association will foster the development of authoritative reportage, independent interpretation and skilful presentation of science through all media.

The formation of the Association will make possible the first international links between Australian science communicators and their counterparts in the Asian-Pacific region and further afield.

The Association plans to organize for its members (and, through their media, for the wider public) a national conference in August 1986, a year when there will be no ANZAAS Congress to provide a focus for public attention on science.

It is planned that the conference will uniquely offer an opportunity for leading scientists to communicate the newest information and ideas in Australian research and to comment on national policies for science and technology.

A paper by Dr Peter Pockley entitled "Generating a True Voice for Australian Science" is available from the Editor (ext 3073).

SPECIAL EDUCATOR VISITS UNIVERSITY

The Unit for Special Education (within the Centre for Policy Studies in Education) is hosting in conjunction with the British Council the visit of Dr Peter Evans from the University of London.

Dr Evans has spent three days at the University and addressed the students on current provisions in the U.K. for special needs students.

He is currently engaged in a major research project to develop a curriculum for students with special needs in the U.K. He was one of the keynote speakers at the Conference of the Australian Association for Special Education in Launceston, and is also presenting seminars at universities throughout Australia.
