The Wicker Baby

A woman is told to collect rocks and wood for the hearth. She walks across a field beside a cliff where she finds a pile of tiny stones. By and by, one begins to move. She picks it up and it cracks open, dousing her hands in water. She tosses the slippery halves into the grass and looks for something more suitable. By and by, she comes across a larger rock under a tree. She heaves the heavy rock onto her shoulders. The dead branches she plucks from the tree, then ties the bundle to her waist. On her way back, she stumbles over a small basket in the middle of the field. Oh! A child is inside the basket. It begins to cry. The basket is wicker and compatible. The woman places them both in her pocket, carrying them to the hearth.
