SPICES - for Pandi (Mutuma)

Abstract
Actually, I could handle the matter of peppercorns really well since I can still see Mother leaving them to ripen on the odupon.
Ama Ata Aidoo was born in Ghana and is a pioneer in depicting the role of African women. Whilst she was still an undergraduate at the University of Ghana in Lagos she was awarded a prize in a competition sponsored by the Mbari Club in Ibadan. She has travelled widely in Africa, Europe and the USA, and apart from a distinguished academic career she was also Minister for Education in the Ghanian government in the 1980s. Her writing includes two plays, Dilemma of a Ghost and Anowa (the latter had a very successful season in London in 1991), two volumes of poetry, Someone Talking is Sometime and An Angry Letter in January (published by Dangaroo Press in 1992), a collection of short stories, No Sweetness Here, and two novels, Our Sister Kiljoy and Changes (1991). The latter won first prize for the African region in the 1992 Commonwealth Writers Prize. Her writing is sometimes experimental, and combines both African and Western traditions.
Actually,
I could handle the matter of
peppercorns
really well since
I can still see Mother
leaving them to ripen
on the odupon.

A proper parasite if ever there was one who viney and shamelessly sprouted by giant roots secured itself to massive ancestral trunks and wove thin firm tendrils singing a long and difficult solo through the dappled undergrowths then
lay queenly and luxuriantly on the branches and
on each wider, greener, thicker leaf, until up and up and up
it reached its highest crescendo and kissed the glorious sun
gloriously.

II

My Sister,
we shall not even discuss
ginger,
wild mint or
its more delicate kin
which acquired
the anti-chicken name akoko-besa
meaning fowls-end;
when grown in
old chamber- and water-poets, and other closed-in spaces
behind the bedroom wall.

Can you believe that?

III

On the other hand,
The Pepper-master's and
The Pepper-mistress's
pepper
is another story.

There was a time when it was known only to priests, priestesses, prophets and sundry holy ones
who ate the sacred stuff to sharpen their tongues

IV

When you first dropped your
artful reproof,
startling me with
its delicious wit and sweet censure,

I first and
guiltily
saw clear evidence of
my westernization,
or rather
the ease with which the food-lover in me had taken to
'foreign cuts' of meat:
the steaks, the chops and

the briskets
duly cased in
condiments of exotic names and flavours;
- never mind their origins -

cardamom
origanum
rosemary and thyme... But then, because we try never to quite give in without a fight I quickly recall that from sweeping airports, driving taxis and cleaning rich old folks' bodies, Cousin Kwaku, Bro Kofi, Sissie Yaa and the rest of the extended family go home to New York's Flat and London's Shepherd Bushes Amsterdam and Hamburg to eat more authentically and richly than the kings and queens we left at home. So whose bourgeois palate are we talking of taking care of? Eh, My Sister, whose bourgeois palate? their visions of the future and the immediate and urgent matter of their sexual prowess. Which name do you know it by, My Sister? Shito Piripiri Miripiri chili cayenne agoi ??? We speak of the beginning and end of all heat...
Where I come from
we called it muoko
its etymology
completely lost in millennias into which
harried wives
ground and ground and ground the precious stuff . . .

If we insisted on counting, we could end up with one hundred species, and still not be done.

My Sister,
when The Pepper-person’s pepper moved out of the shrines and the temples, it stayed for a thousand more years in near-by habitations known only to locals in Africa and Asia . . .

— another ancient and spicy secret, valued in equal parts with gold dust then, but soon to be just one more Third World exotica variously liked and apologised for.

These days,
between the mildest and the most abrasive,
green, red, yellow, thin, squat, full or hollow, peppers
grace supermarket stalls from Atlanta through London to Zurich . . .

from which places
we zero in
on the issue of how we take care of our bourgeois palates.
