1998

Poems

William Logan

Follow this and additional works at: https://ro.uow.edu.au/kunapipi

Recommended Citation
Available at:https://ro.uow.edu.au/kunapipi/vol20/iss3/18

Research Online is the open access institutional repository for the University of Wollongong. For further information contact the UOW Library: research-pubs@uow.edu.au
Poems

Abstract

This serial is available in Kunapipi: https://ro.uow.edu.au/kunapipi/vol20/iss3/18
William Logan

UNDER THE PALMS

Behind the broken-knuckled palmetto, face half-hidden, half-lit by razory fronds, lost canvas of a Renaissance master lost in the subtropics (lacking only the emerald glaze of the parrot’s outspread wing or the dart and stitch of the hummingbird’s needlepoint), there you were, smiling and sexual, skin aglow with new-world salt.

Before you stood the cities of the plain. The sky hung like a backdrop, a foamy SOS-pad blue, darkening to storm.

You looked as if you could hear the scuttle and whimper of undergrowth.

the downward exultation of roots, the coral snake whose Magdalene beauty (crimson sliced with black, like a Chanel suit) could ravage these whispers in the old tongue.

When I found you, face-down in a drawer, fifteen years erased as if by the retoucher’s art, how young you were,

your beauty all in the varnish.

THE BORN LAWYER

It was a tale told by an idiot.
The slanting lawns where we played croquet slanted down to the wind-chewed bay speckled with dark islands, like my mother’s beauty spots.
Our town was asleep.
Dying maples crossed the fieldstone walls;
a few clapboards warped on the old town hall,
rugged with age and indisposition.
Late in the day my mother would weep

at nothing, at nothing she could see.
I stared at the mouth of my pet horned toad.
My father's anger grew as it snowed –
he swore we could fish like bears.
Our "river" was six inches deep.

Down in the sun-marked woods, a shout.
We bent to the icy stream,
and there inside it, raw glimmer of dream,
there, in my father's bruised raw hands,
the glowing mottled broken trout.

THE TIDE, 1955

"Romanticism ... is dangerously lighted
by those bayonets that Blake and Goethe observed passing their garden hedges."
- George Steiner

The passion has drained slowly, like the tide.
In the watery haze, a bored girl contemplates the languor of the anemone's arms, the clever crab with its torn claw –

beneath the cliff stands our pink motel, it's sand-starred stairs, the television frothy and blood-purple like outward sea,
the noon-light blinded through the gauze curtain,

and on everything the taste of salt.
A freighter perches on the horizon like a finial.
The dead are old news, and each hour passes the eye in downward flight

The ghosts within us confuse us with our sorrows,
as we confuse them with their memories.
Now the shipping lanes devour the fishermen,
and the last war seethes on the sailor's forearms.