SCOTOMA

She dashed towards him, faster than all the colours leap towards the light or rush away at dusk, crying, ‘Angel! Beloved!’ For he was perfect, so she said, with his twelve tattoos, dairy-free diet, weekly manicure and mirror-bright shoes.
One tattoo was a road of words round his body, a spiral from toe to crown where it set fire to her mouth when she touched his pate with her tongue.
He even pissed in a golden arc which lit the night sky. She watched the fine trail lift on the mild wind wobbling across her vision fit to blind.

A VISIT FROM JANEY

Janey wants to wreck my bathroom she’s so out of it. She’s staggering towards the unexpected wall of glass, waving her bottle of booze, she’s raiding the cabinet for pills and screaming at the lime-scale stains in the bath. The echo suits her voice so she smiles and sits with a bump on the wooden toilet seat, then grins up at the overhead cistern, as she slips her beaded dress over her head.
So here’s her stocky body, her small girl shape slumped and naked on my toilet.
And now she’s resonating my white tiles, vibrating my roomy old bath: ‘O Lord,’ she croons to the lime-scale, ‘O Lord,’ to the tap which drips, ‘O Lord,’ to the overhead cistern, cold porcelain, on which is gathering the magic condensation of her breath.
DELECTABLE CREATURES
for Wendy Wheeler

‘But he would have us remember most of all To be enthusiastic over the night Not only for the sense of wonder It alone has to offer, but also

Because it needs our love: for with sad eyes Its delectable creatures look up and beg Us dumbly to ask them to follow;’
W.H. Auden, ‘In Memory of Sigmund Freud’

You won’t remember, but it was October and the street trees still coloured like rude bouquets.
I had some rare walks by the river, the weak sun loose on the water and the light so washed out and lovely it would make you cry if you weren’t completely alert. Every step I took they were uncovering something: people sleeping under cardboard, a lost riverboat marooned on a freak low tide, the buried flotsam which made metal detectors buzz, theatres with resonant names: the Rose, the Globe.

And I was carrying a torch for someone to the point of hallucination:
we rolled in flames through seven fields, the burning so thorough I longed to be shocked by water, a faceful of anything, even the smelly Thames.

And I remember the press full of doctors, of inventions; a herringbone fragment of DNA to fool a virus, a wisp of vitamin to lock on to inner decay and knock it dead for good. We were saving vouchers, too, for air miles.

There was, O yes, the morning I woke up to see an open book, drying on the drainer.
Dimly reconstructing the night before I remembered dropping off, head on the desk, getting up moments later, to select the book with extra-exquisite care from any old shelf.
I slowly chose a page, spread it with jam and butter, and tried to stuff it down my mouth. It was, of course, Freud's Jokes and the Unconscious. I must have tried to wash it like a tea plate, stacked it, then put myself into my bed.

I think the explanation could be this: that in the light, the river was sometimes pink, and St Paul's was pink, and even Lloyds in the distance was pink, as I crossed Waterloo Bridge with a purchase under my arm, some piece of frou frou or a novel to bring me back from the seven fields, back to the river-mist which must once have been river water, back to breathing mist so deeply I could feel each droplet hit my diaphragm like shot.

TO ROTTERDAM FOR THE ROSIE B. BABES

Even the children are dancing and in the foyer of the nightclub the ornamental fish are restless. I've been ten hours getting to Rotterdam but Rose on tenor sax gives it some throat as specialist dancers turn out in black and white for some low-slung, loose-kneed jiving. We drink Grolsch for free because my sweetie knows the barman. Rose says, 'I've been singing that song for twenty years and still don't know what it means.' Well I can tell her. It means lights on in Rotterdam and shine on the grubby buildings, the ferocious port. It means Rose, two saxes, trumpet, and trombone, piano, traps and bass, all peeling back layers of occupation, layers of blitz; Rose folding sea walls and reclaimed land, rolling up canals. It means the North Sea swallowing the whole damned lot as Rosie sings again My Funny Valentine.
