For those who find OZ hard to read this issue is the next best thing to braille.
NEW YORK: Lower East Side types all disclaiming knowledge of where the several thousand neatly-rolled joints came from--the ones that arrived in New York homes on St Valentine's Day accompanied by a heart-encircled fact sheet which declared that 'marihuana is not habit-forming any more than are the movies' despite the 200,000 arrests for possession last year. The anonymous donors promised that more joints would be sent out Mother's Day 'to persons selected from the phone books.' Yippie Abbie Hoffman, sometime spokesman for the Tompkins Square community, says: 'We wish we knew who did it; we never got any. My theory is that it's the American Tobacco company. They know that with all this pressure on tobacco that cigarettes will be declared illegal soon. They've already registered names like Acapulco Gold and Panama Red and now they're looking around for ways to test new products.'

Ford's Theatre in Washington spent thousands on installing hard-bottomed seats, replicas of those in the theatre when Lincoln was shot, only to discover (after complaints from patrons) that asses are apparently not the same shape today. Red velvet cushions have been ordered. DC's radical newsletter Mayday (now seeking suggestions for a new name because Mayday has been previously copyrighted) says the Federal government is growing marihuana for 'testing' purposes on Senator James Eastland's Mississippi farm. Senators Albert Gore and Everett Dirksen are feeding over whether the iris (Gore's choice) or the marigold should be proclaimed the national flower. Meanwhile, Rome burns... The men's john in the Supreme Court building dispenses watered soap. Everybody's into the movie thing these days with techniques often getting more attention than the actual content. Montage or collage films, for example, popping up on all sides with various methods aimed at the same results. Two projectors with different films combine beautifully on one screen (Warhol, etc.) but you can also get the same effect in the processing (as John Chamberlain does in his "Secret Life of Hernando Cortes"). And you can even do it in the camera by rewinding the film back to a certain point and double exposing as you shoot a different scene over the first.

Ed Seeman specializes in this method with his mind-blowing Frank Zappa footage (now being edited by Zappa for release in the spring). Chamberlain, by the way, has also screened a color movie called 'Wide Point' which displays fragmentary scenes and images on seven enormous screens at once. Fascinating to learn how much more one's eyes can be forced to absorb simultaneously. Then there are the Maysles Brothers whose latest epic is about a team of bible-salesmen touring the south, making their pitch at some gruesomely suburban homes. The Maysles technique is to hang around so close for so long that everybody gets used to you and you end up with film as close to real life as you can get. In the case of their "Salesman" it works marvelously.

Universities were described as "mere trade schools for the military-industrial complex" by California delegates to a recent Peace & Freedom party conference at Venice. Committees were set up to study lowering the voting age, institute free public transportation and change the present penal system. Charter flights to Africa for $450 roundtrip are being organized by Jim Daniel, 1933 New Hampshire Ave NW, Washington DC 20009. The NY Post and other straight papers around the country are currently on a sobstory kick--interviews with the families of slaughtered GIs who invariably 'didn't want to go to Vietnam'. Presumably the reporters didn't think it cool to ask the obvious question, 'Then why did you let him go?' And none of the stories chooses to make the point that if a kid willingly goes off to a foreign country to kill complete strangers without asking 'Why?', then neither he nor his family has any right complaining if he doesn't come back. Poems are too spiritual for Americans. (Greenfelt's commune magazine, 25c from Box 1037, Carmel, Calif. 93921)

The California firm, Computicket Corp, that's replacing those old-fashioned gaudy-colored theatre tickets with a standard computer-punched one, book European theatre tickets within seconds.

Nixon's footstool is stoned most of the time... Bantam Books offers to pay expenses involved in setting up press conferences between its author and college newspaper editors. Why does Douglas Fairbanks call himself 'Junior'? Does he still see himself as a child?

What may have killed Ramparts was its hang-up on glossy paper, full-color photographs, general extravagance. Ramparts, top brass threw money around from the beginning like a drunken sailor; on that budget almost any competent newsmen could have kept the mag going for at least four times as long. Ramparts' problem was that it always had more money than experience (or commonsense) as became only too sadly clear when they had SF virtually to themselves during the newspaper strike and filled the gap with a subcollegiate tabloid that nobody bothered to buy or read.

William Buckley's rightwing National Review gave a glowing testimonial to Boston's Avatar which, unlike most undergrounds says NR writer Anthony Dolan, is 'patriotic'... Sad that Bill Graham's Fillmore had to go the slickpaper route with his pocket-size program that looks like a replica of Broadway's Playbill. It could have been a creative product. But then one sees all the ads (20 out of 24 pages) and remembers that friendly Bill Graham isn't in this business to be creative, right?... Courses on belly-dancing, medical aspects of drugs, gourmet cooking, rock music, stained glass art, witchcraft and communal living are offered by SF's Heliotrope (Free University) which adds that courses 'generally take place in the warmth and comfort of the instructors home... but they may meet at the beach, or in a tree'.
Dear OZ,
I belong to a "commite d'action" at the Sorbonne and we were all upset to read: "Unmask a teacher, you'll find a copper" (Angelo Quattrrochi - OZ Feb 69). The other day, 200 teachers occupied the Sorbonne to protest against repression and students being sent to the army because of their political action. Most teachers want revolution; its obvious, as during our active strike; we interrupted some lectures to explain this strike and most teachers didn't object - though some students did.

Also, I don't like this RMS idea if those people talk of "Professionals" or of "part-time Revolutionary Militant Student". Revolution is not a new game or fashion - it's very serious, and if one really believes in it, anything he does or says is revolution. I was quite upset too to read the French addresses given by the RMS at the moment, only the "commite d'action"can be powerful as they unite all revolutionary tendencies. And we're precisely trying to get rid of the PSU and other Unions, because of all they do is make a lot of publicity - even abroad, as OZ print it for their own little pointless Unions - Unions have proved to be useless before May. May was an action of the masses (and not of the Unions) and Unions like those mentioned in OZ won't make a revolution.

If Angelo Quattrrochi or anybody from OZ is still in Paris, I'd like to meet this person as I quite like OZ (except what I mentioned) and I'd like to discuss things or even help if I can, I wish OZ all the best.

Dear OZ,
What is happening? What's with all this violence? These Poor Bastards are sick. Let's stop now before these phoney curves blow the whole scene.
Everybody knows that a social revolution is just underway. Our attitudes have changed radically in the last 5 years. More sweeping changes are yet to come. Grass will win the day we hope we have the control to achieve the aim's of most. A peaceful society. A love community. Naked and unafraid: 'What do the petrol bomb mob want, Stalin??' A policed state, That's great for the States. They're that already. What do they want in the words of the Prophet? Fuck knows!
If they want to kick shit in the face of the establishment, there are nicer ways.
In the spring when the gardens are reborn lets go out into the streets Naked. Make love in the streets. On Buses in Trains. Fuck in the Parks and Squares. Give flowers and grass to the fuzz. Lets do it in the road! Fuck for peace. You must agree its no more ridiculous than throwing molotov cocktails at policemen, and if its publicity that they're after they'll get it; look at the spread that the ade at the Albert Hall got, and John & Yoko. But please, don't lower yourselves to the violence that typifies the grey world that surrounds us. Don't imitate it like a bunch of sheep. Kids have got more sense. Let's have a revolution by all means but lets not act as sick as the rest of the Alf's.

Dear Harold & Papa God Nixon included.

I hope somebody feels the same and rewrites this better than I have.

Love
Pete

Sir,
It has come to my notice that a disgusting and pornographic publication called OZ is being mailed to this address.
Take notice, that under no circumstances are any further copies of this film, to be delivered to my daughter at this or any other address.

Comrades:
I don't know where comrade Buckman got his information on Anarchism - from the columns of the "Guardian" perhaps, being charitable. Malatesta defined anarchism as "Society organised without Authority". In what respects could that differ from "counter-authoritarian society"?
On the charge that "Their beliefs are based...on everyone being members of a community able to sustain itself without rules" I would reply, firstly, that this differs not at all in essence from his own concept of autonomous communities (unless by revolutionary state he means revolutionary Stage, which is particularly a contradiction in terms). Secondly, it is not necessary to overthrow the State before carrying out liberation activities. Counter-authoritarian activities can be carried out here and now by anarchist and liberation groups. The East London Libertarians, active in the London Squatters Campaign (and elsewhere) are a case in point.
It is possible that some such libertarian groupings could act as base-units for Comrade Buckman's autonomous communities, co-operating and helping each other on "Mutual Aid" - for, as he himself admits, "If [the individual] steps too far out of line the system will clobber him" Collective action is necessary in Leftie jargon - its called "Solidarity"!
He further accuses the anarchists of "imposing" their system on those "unwilling to accept it". Yet he regards the Left generally as potential allies - and is thus put in the position of singling out for authoritarianism precisely the one tendency of the Left which is uncompromisingly counter-authoritarian, and enlisting the aid of groups whose belief in Authority is complete, (as long as they have the authority). They are also dogmatic, despite comrade Buckman's ideas about them - the S.L.L. and certain Maoist groups are notable in this respect.
As to the Corrara Congress; perhaps I should quote 'Freedom!'; "after all old revolutionary movements there is always 'a residue of the old faithful who have come to regard themselves an establishment.' There was a division between those who 'wanted an institutionalised adherence to a doctrine, and those who wanted freedom of revolutionary action. The British delegate indeed opposed 'the idea of national delegations, as accepting those bourgeois concepts which destroy the roots of international revolutionary solidarity' (Freedom, 21-9-68).

Many of comrade Buckman's concepts are unclear — I would presume that by "discipline" he means self-discipline (as opposed to externally imposed rules of behaviour) — an essential in all anarchist thought. But what does he mean by "organisation"? Too many people on the Left equate organisation with bureaucracy, enabling them on the one hand to justify their own bureaucratic excesses as "organisation," while condemning the anti-bureaucratic anarchists as being, therefore, and organisation.

I would agree on the inadvisability of merely 'dropping out' in the purely emotional involvement of the "hippie". Quite apart from such an action's impotence in the face of repression, such involvement without a defensive basis of theory, can be dangerous. (Hitlers adaptation of the "Wandervogel" of the twenties to the twenties to become the Hitlerjugend of the thirties, and the Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, are two cases to think about).

Finally, while agreeing wholeheartedly on the inappropriateness of Third World models, I should like to end with a quotation from the "Red Book" (CH.26):

1. The individual is subordinate to the organisation.
2. The minority is subordinate to the majority.
3. The lower level is subordinate to the higher level.
4. The entire membership is subordinate to the Central Committee.

So much for the questioning of those who would ally themselves with British Maoists, please note.

Fraternally,
Mike Don

Oz Baby,

It seems really sad to me that in order to create Drop out city, (Paul's letter, Oz 18) the method suggested involved founding it with bread derived from shows etc. surely this is just bloody hypocritical.

How the hell can any society be justified when its founded by one of the main things it opposes? By doing that we would be indistinguishable from warmongers who say in order to have peace there must be a war.

The whole idea of drop out city is beautiful, but free meals, never, someone has to pay for them in a place like the smokes.

Why not take over a deserted stretch of coast line and make shelters of branches or driftwood, grow all necessary food and all excess trade for things that Mother Nature doesn't provide, only then could it be a moneyless society.

Love to those who want or need it.

I'm really just sitting here listening to Bobbie Dylan. I had a friend called Keith, he wrote a poem called 'Bob Dylan My idol'. This was to be a lengthy piece... no, piece of writing, but well now I just don't know.

Bob Dylan's pretty good, some of his lyrics really screw me up, I think he's a druggie, I also think, no believe he's a druggie.

I wish I had an object in life but I haven't it doesn't really matter I suppose.

This is rather meaningless I know, but, well, I just a meaningless guy, sorry.

I was going to end there well you know how it is.

Dear Oz,

SMASH capitalism, violence, corruption, stagnation, injustice, they all cry.

And how are they going to do it? With violence, hash, acid, and their own form of injustice, in taking a Policeman, nice guy, no harmful whips what to do? Kick him in the face, belly, anywhere, call him fuzz.

Yes, Tramper on all who are in the way, no clear sight here.

My dear God. How many must be hurt by the herd with warped ideals, before somebody sees the light.

Dear Friends,

I was a little surprised by the criticism of David Ramsey Steele's Smash Cash article. Anyone who works with money will realise the amazing amount of trouble cash in all its various forms can cause.

In the past month the following things have effectively loused things up for me. (I am a salesman in an Electricity Show room). First of all a guy walked in complaining about getting a letter demanding that he pay two outstanding HP payments on his refrigerator. He said he'd paid them.

The following day he was in again with 38 pieces of paper which were receipts for each of his HP payments. Checking through these I discovered he was in fact one short, and another receipt was invalid because it had not been machine printed through the shops till machine. This receipt had however been written out by me and I saw it as my responsibility, so on the spur of the moment I decided to offer to pay the payment in place of the invalid receipt.

My charitable action however was not seen as such by our head office, and the following week one of my numerous superiors appeared with an accountant. I then found myself on the carpet — for offering to pay the money in myself — it was then suggested that I had virtually confessed my crime by offering to pay the money in myself, at this later date. I was going to give you a list

Dear Oz,

The reproduction of Eugene Schoenfeld's proclivities in Oz 18 could only be dismissed as iniquitous filth. Pages like this no doubt create pretentiousness, perhaps necessary for such a publication but this publication but not in anyway compare with the Sharp-Von Mora tacit well implied "Magic Theatre."

Jeremy Hinds, Manchester 10.
showing what a stupid system the whole currency thing is however the final comment I will make is this one. There is plenty for all, at least in this country. I tend to feel so few to have much more than their fair share, and I find only when people are very hard up, will they bug and get something that isn't theirs.

Love to all from the centre of a stupid battle of great sadness and bewilderment.

Terry Kidd.

Dear Editor,

Isn't it just the time for Clive James (wind up Black Dwarfs, Oz, Feb. 69) to realise that sometimes, just occasionally, we dull, classic members of the British working class master the intellectual strength to digest his brilliantly reasoned columns in Oz, and sometimes, just occasionally, have the impertinence to disagree with him? 'Britain is an inherently pluralist society.' The information. Tell us of a society which is not. He talks of the 'anti-intellectual revolution'. Now then, Clive, principle down a bit here. The revolution only seems anti-intellectual to you, because you obviously see intellect as an entity valuable entirely in its own right with no necessary relevance to anything except itself. No intellect, not even our stunted working man Socialist tradition, is ever developed without something into which first to get its teeth. Give any man a steak and he will chew it. To be anti-intellectual now is the healthiest attitude a thinking man can have. Try to understand the real intellect of the historically hard-bitten century-old grass roots mostly uneducated international left and you will be helping your own brilliance to perhaps develop a little further.

Does the 'classic Left' have 'only objectives'? Well, to councillors, politicians, financiers, businessmen, soldiers and all other heads of men who, once they have succeeded in grabbing something from the rest of us, wish to make bloody sure we don't ever get it back. And if all that Guss of Germany, Pasolini of Italy and James of Great Britain (or is it Australia?) can see as enemies of the revolution are their fellow-intellectuals, then you must be in an extremely fortunate, secure, well-heeled and blissful situation, and I wish you good luck.

So, Mr. James, please continue to delight us with your frolics, thereby making an Emerald Isle, I assure you, even broader and more civilised than it already may be. However, seeing that we both have the pleasure of living in the same nauseating, over-civilised city, may I recommend you to spend the odd evening out in the Newmarket Road pubs 'with us and our discontentors, which are legion, and forget for a moment the plush Common Rooms and effete Satirical Clubs of the University, where more hot air is dispersed nightly than in the Mill Road Pubs that's. Yours fraternally,

Stuart Clucas,
(Vice-chairman, Cambridge University Branch of the National Union of Public Employees)

SIR/Madam,

I don't have any money, but I have more sense than to eat the sort of food recommended in your feature, 'Poverty Cooking'. On a diet of recipes like Beggers Stew, Cracked Egg Omelette, or Ballied Up Bolognese, I would remain poor, physically, spiritually, as well as materially, all my life. Being without 'money is often unavoidable, perhaps even laudable, but there is absolutely no need to eat 'poorly,' 'poverty cooking', no matter what variety of recipes turns up in subsequent issues, is wrongly 'conceived. Cheap, no doubt, beggers stew is. Delicious it may be (in a degraded sense — but this sort of concoction is ten times more delicious if it is made ten times more expensively) but these are hardly the two most important criteria. Is it rich in protein? Is it good for you? and the answer is of course, no. About as good for you as a meal you might buy in a Wimp Bar of a Golden egg or any other cheap restaurant chain in London — nutritive value, nil. Just platefuls of shit for those at the bottom of the heap. Shit to give you bad skin, bad breath, constipation, piles, baldness, and generally to keep you running along at about half pressure. The droppings from the Fat Hanky's table, the imitations of some of the gastronomic delights of western cuisine. A cuisine which is thoroughly decadent anyway. An attitude to food which by ignoring the nature of man and what is good for him, and concentrating on appearance and taste, has most of its adherents diseased in some way by the time they are forty. The average life span in the west is about sixty five. For this longevity, of which it is so proud, western civilisation relies not on the sensibility of its dietary habits, but on the brilliance of its surgeons, and the dubious efficacy of its drugs. That is the best that can be expected — and 'poverty cooking' represent that same attitude at its very worst. On beggers stew, life will be very short and very unhappy. Racked by disorders, both psychological and physical, you will be an easy prey for the vultures of capitalism and the overground. Don't beg, don't scrounge cracked eggs from Sainsbury's don't buy cheap spaghetti from cheap supermarkets, OPT OUT. Don't let your lack of bread turn the getting of enough food into a middle class hang-up.

Deliver us from this perversity of eating — you are what you eat. Brown rice, fresh vegetables in small quantities are what you should start with; make every day a trip, spend less, go macrobiotic. Macrobiotics is simple intelligence, common sense and natural foods. The authors of your column should read up on the theory of yin and yang before digging deeper into the garbage can. Roast Trafalear Square pigeon might, just might, be OK, but you would probably be better off eating the 6d carton of grain. Doses of strontium-90 all round.

Dear OZ,

Sprats yes. But why potatoes and spaghetti? Cheap food can be nourishing. For instance, MUESLI can be made for under 2s. per pound as compared to 6s for a packaged brand. It contains oats, 2/6 lbs; millet, 3/6 lb; wheatgerm, 2/- lb; barley kernels, 1/-; soya flour; nuts; Sainsbury's walnut pieces are 1/5; sultanas 1 lb, 2/-; sea salt.

It can be made as a porridge as normal. Or, with milk and fruit. There are endless cheap combinations.

Vegetable soups are also very nourishing. Winter vegetables: carrots, onions, turnips, parsnips, cabbages, leeks, swedes, sprouts all combine well. Heat up thickened with soya flour of wholemeal; garnish with cheese. With wholemeal bread this is a good meal. You can make enough for 8 for about 5s bread inclusive. Lentil broth is another good stand by. Lentils cost about 2s per lb, simply soak overnight heat up, flavour with herbs.

If your real interest lies in helping folk buy and eat cheap and nourishing food, why not put people in touch with wholealers, or open a distribution centre for goods at almost wholesale prices, thereby avoiding food manufacturers con. By buying wholemeal bread, you can save from 50%. Cereals and vegetables are the cheapest foods.

Yours,

Anthony Lovell,

Dear Lee, Winfred got busted yesterday, and I got busted about 3 or 4 weeks ago. I had 350 grams hash in my room and found it. I've been living in pure hell for those 3-4 weeks, and managed somehow to keep from being completely insane.

They decided right away that I was "selling it weren't you". I told them, and to make me admit it, they tied my hands and feet and hoisted me on a length of steel scaffold between two desks and let me hang there by my arms and legs, they took my shoes and socks off and whipped the soles of my feet with a cowhide. They also tied a towel around my head and poured water onto it over my mouth and nose, this went on for half an hour every morning and afternoon for 3 days, while they shouted at me "you were selling it weren't you". I managed somehow to keep from admitting that, don't ask me how. I am 26 years old, and it's the first time I've cried. I think since I was 10. I was thrown into a cell about 10 ft sq.

Winfred had ½ kilo of stuff in his sleeping bag, and I managed to pass a message on to my friend Winfred in Rabat to remove it, he promised to do so this morning, so I hope he has. My advice to you right now is to get out of Morocco as soon as possible, as my consul tells me they are arresting people all over the country, about 30 were deported from Agadir recently. I realize you have no passport, and if you know of any way I can help you write and let me know. I will be living in London now.

My sentence was one month imprisonment suspended sentence and as they knew I had 250 DH (£2-18) they fined me that, but that wasn't the end of my troubles. The Prosecutor for the King wasn't satisfied, and wanted to keep me in prison for another 3 months for another trial, and was going to give me two years. That's what I think Winfred will get if they find the stuff.

I don't advise you to go and try to see him, because they will arrest you too, and no matter what you tell them, they won't believe it, and will not make any enquiries about it either. They decide what they will charge you with, and torture you until you admit it. Then if you don't admit it, they write out your confession and make you sign it anyway. They said in mine that I bought a little to smoke and the rest was for sale. To see Winfred in prison, you have to go and get special permission from the Tribunal, and they really HATE Hippies, so don't do it man, you might fuck it up for him.

Don't forget to write if I can help you in any way. I did all I could to help Winfred, as I was deported out of the country by a Police Inspector. Maybe if you sent somebody who looks a bit straight just to be sure that his stuff is removed, don't go yourself, you are sure to be arrested, they only ask to see your Passport, and that's enough. You may think I'm raving a bit, but believe me I have good cause to, I wonder that I didn't go completely crazy.

Good luck again,

Sandy

On the boat Ceuta-Algeciras.

Sandy is in London now. In Rabat the British vice-consul asked him to warn 'hippie travellers' that Morroccan pipe dream days are over. The country is being cleaned up for tourists.

STOP PRESS:

An organisation called KK has just been formed by Tom Cartwright (who was busted with Neal Philips in Greece) with the co-operation of Release and Bit. It has three main purposes: 1. To help those doing time or awaiting trial by sending bread, books, clothes, etc., and providing legal advice. 2. To collect information on busts, severity of sentences and prison conditions, to publicise such information and bring pressure to bear where necessary. 3. To act as an association comprising of bust-survivors, their friends and helpers, who will be a morale booster for those in jail.

Anyone who can help with information, bread, clothes, books, letters or visits to prisoners, contact KK, Release Office, 50a Princedale Road, London, W.11. Tel: 01-229 7757

Abbie Hoffman's 'Revolution for the Hell of It' is the most important book yet to emerge, or rather, leap out of the Underground. Of the 10 founders of the Yippies, Paul Krassner (of the Realist) and Jerry Rubin (Of the Berkeley Free Speech Movement), Hoffman was a founder freak of Yippie! (Youth International Party, see OZ 10) - the anti-organisation which invented Chicago. This acid gamester is an intuitively brilliant media tactician, a tireless psychic guerrilla and a profound dialectician of new style politics: 'Political irrelevance is more effective than political relevance ... A be-in is an emotional United Nations ... If you want to begin to understand our culture you can start by comparing Frank Sinatra and the Beatles. The Viet Cong attacking the U.S. Embassy in Saigon is a work of art ... there is no programme - a programme would make our movement sterile'. Revolution for the Hell of It (written in three amphetamine days) is an epigrammanifesto for the only revolution possible in an age where there are 'no more political solutions, only technological ones ... all the rest is propaganda (Jacques Ellul), and as such is a total repudiation of New Left political beauticians and their hoary Marxist utensils. His strategy I would call the Politics of Play, a concept which, along with his book, I hope to discuss in a future OZ (Revolution for the Hell of it. Dial Press Inc. 750 Third Ave. New York, NY 10017; $13.95 . . . some extracts appeared in IT 51).

OZ urgently requires an amazing comic-strip artist. Send samples of your work to 52 Princesdale Road, W11 for Jon Goodchild, or contact him direct at 352 7258 (evenings).

Some readers may have detected an improvement in the quality of this magazine. Those with broad tastes may also have noticed Zeta’s catastrophic slump into a mire of witless incomprehensibility. These two events are not un-connected. Paul Lawson, once our assistant editor, left OZ some months ago for the bounteous pastures of London’s most unnecessary lit magazine. We wish him luck.

Piper Greene seeks ‘reviews, articles, editorial or stray facts’ on John Maybury. They should ease their student-wide anarchist commune. The editors of the Buffalo Chip, from Holden, produced for Australia by General Motors (‘At 60 miles an hour the only sound you can hear is the rust!’) the dishonesty of the press, the cowardice of the Australian Broadcasting Corporation and the abominable bellicosity, racialism and Rugby Club morality of the Government. A Sydney magistrate, Gerald Locke, once ruled that ‘the publication would deprave and corrupt young people or unhealthy minded adults so injudiciously is explained that their publications lack one single, distinctive or original feature (good or bad) and that they have somehow managed to resist the spreading technical and aesthetic printing advancements which rendered their efforts obsolete twenty years ago. The editors’ mood is coy, soporific, unchallenging.

A week after I joined a student paper in Australia in 1962, the editor called for the Vice Chancellor to resign, published highly confidential and scandalous minutes of Senate meetings, exposed Security links with the administration and created an outcry that reverberated around the lecture halls and newspaper columns of every city in the country. In Australia! In 1962!

A few years later the same newspaper (Tharunka, laugh, it’s Aborigine for ‘message stick’) was prosecuted by the Sydney Vice-Squad for obscenity, and its editors fined. Meanwhile, the editor of a nearby student paper Honi Soit(1) campaigned for the abolition of the student union and the substitution of a student-wide anarchist commune. The British editor’s stock answer to any suggestion that they should ease their publication into the nineteenth century is: Oh! The printer wouldn’t let us do that.

Change the printer. ‘But’ they say, recovering their composure, ‘they’ve been printing us for 25 years.’

Change the printer. ‘But he does it as a favour very cheaply’, cheaply and badly. Change the printer, improve quality, boost circulation and advertising revenue. Oh yes, advertising. For all their dem-

It is doubtful whether the abovementioned yippie editors could exact much revolution from UK students, let alone schoolchildren, if a survey published in the latest issue of the University newspaper, is to be taken as a guide. Sennet (Feb 26) has completed a survey of almost one thousand students. He says they say is an accurate mirror of opinion at England’s largest university. ‘If Parliament were to be elected to-day’, 32% of students would vote conservative, 30% Labour, 16% Liberal, although they would prefer Harold Wilson as Prime Minister. 41% are satisfied with the present political system, and 60% have changed their views since attending university. Of these 60%, 30% have shifted to the right. The survey concludes that student publishing is ‘parochial and insular.’ After reading Sennet, I came to the same conclusion – not about students, but about student editors.

Why are British student papers so bad? Most of them look like trade journals for the asbestos industry. Even the best of them slavishly imitate traditional newspaper layout styles (bold intro paras, justified type, column heads etc). The prose is plunk Fleet Street, the issues stubbornly provincial. Student journalists drop with surprise when it fier little tabloid makes Cherwell and Varsity seem like the prose prostitute’s training-beds they really are. Student editors are completely ignorant of the world-wide proliferation of Underground alternative publications - which, from Dallas (Notebooks) to Wellington (Cock) from Saskatchewan (The Carillon) from even Curacao (Vito) to Bombay (Anti/Pro) are light-years ahead of the sal, tit, grey balanities of undergraduate role playing. Recently, when I was showing the staff of Sennet samples of these amateur, indigent and much harrassed newspapers, they at least had the integrity to be embarrassed. But one of them asked plaintively, as she inspected the world’s most beautiful newspaper, the San Francisco Oracle, ‘WELL, suppose we did try and turn Sennet into something original. What would Fleet Street editors think? They might prefer Sennet like it is’. A question which reveals, I think, the reasoning for these incompetent standards of student publishing.

We wish Private Eye goodluck with their libel fund and offer congratulations on their move to palatial three storey offices. Now the editors on the Wilton-carpeted top floor ring the secretaries on the cord-matted bottom floor for endless cups of tea, with which they scurry upstairs past the pleasant, always-on-the-verge-of-being-fired, Tony Rushton.

The last Australian OZ was published in February. From its first issue (April Fools Day, 1963) OZ was a semi-digestible stew of satire, short stories, caricature, pertinent Hansard reprints, inside news and gossip. It was the only magazine to ever record the real cause for the unexpected resignation of Sydney’s Archbishop Gough (who now presides over the smallest parish in Britain) and it once published a remarkable Guide to Sydney’s Underworld with an accompanying pop-top Twenty chart of local hoods. (Unfortunately the latter precipitated such a flood of underworld jealousy that there were several flushing of one near fatal gangland shooting). Regular outbursts of police atrocities were recorded under the title ‘The stiff arm of the law’ and a month in censorship feature was dropped as examples became too commonplace. The magazine exposed that sacred cow, Holden, produced for Australia by General Motors (‘At 60 miles an hour the only sound you can hear is the rust!’) the dishonesty of the press, the cowardice of the Australian Broadcasting Corporation and the abominable bellicosity, racialism and Rugby Club morality of the Government. A Sydney magistrate, Gerald Locke, once ruled that ‘the publication would as to fancy it as literature and so misguided as to cultivate the habit of reasoning'. He discarded the testimony of seventeen 'expert' witnesses who were so injudicious as to consider the magazine had literary merit and so misguided as to dispute its tendency to deprave and corrupt, Martin Sharp, art editor, was sentenced to four months hard labour and editors Neville & Walsh to 6 months. The prosecution had spent many court hours establishing whether a pun contained in a cartoon, 'Get Folked', was in fact a pun—which is some indication of the prevailing level of intelligence.

Following the verdict, one of Australia's most popular news commentators, the late Eric Baume, had this to say: 'And I was very pleased indeed to see—and I don't care whether these people who talk about liberties and so forth jump into the lake—I was very pleased to see that three young men were gaoled on charges of publishing an obscene publication, OZ magazine. Well, that's a good thing—to wipe OZ out will be one of the best things for the country. A dirty little rag with filth in it'. Two years later Mr. Locke's verdict was quashed on appeal.

The Australian OZ team are now to publish a monthly newsletter which will compensate for the infuriating vagaries of local media. It will contain a pun—which is some indication of the prevailing level of intelligence.

One of the more depressing memories of Australian OZ days, if readers will forgive the persistently autobiographical tone of this month’s Spike, is the panic tour of print shops.

I once saw about fifty printers in three days with proofs of a forthcoming issue (I still recall its cover picture of a British policeman verbally offering Proumo his sister. Sorry). The original printer had been scared off by police action and was anxious to unload the metal. It was an embarrassing feeling, tramping streets with the hard-fought proofs of a magazine that may never be printed. Almost at the point of abandonning the OZ project, we visited—with a resigned jocularity—the Anglican Press, who, to our utter amazement, accepted the job without question. This experience of seeking out printers, with the desperation of a junkie haunting pharmaceutical warehouses, has occurred ever since, with the relentless consistency of the trade cycle.

We have no idea what press—indeed, if any, this OZ is being prepared for. One printer (London Caledonian) reacted with such unsavoury hysteria to a Sunday Times news item linking our names, that, as you will see from their outburst below, it was pointless proceeding with them—although a price had been agreed and a production schedule established. While generally admitting the absence of legal obstacles, printers' reasons for rejecting OZ include:

1. It will upset other clients (we print lots of religious material).
2. It will upset the unions (too revolutionary).
3. It will upset the tea lady ('tastelessness').

And incredibly, one printer last week said, 'we'd love to do the job but we're too near Windsor'. Windsor?—the palace you know. They might not like it. Even the printers of Fanny Hill refused to quote for OZ.

There will be no free press in this country until OZ, Black Dwarf, IT, Hustler, and the Running (late) Man establish their own printing company.

Dear Sir, re:—OZ.

We act for London Caledonian Press Ltd. In the Sunday Times of 23rd February, 1969, there appeared on page 15 an article which stated that 'OZ' was 'fixed up now with the London Caledonian Press'. Our instructions are that there is no truth whatever in this allegation and we wrote accordingly on 27th to the Sunday Times. In reply they have written in their letter as follows:

'We have made inquiries of the editor of the magazine and have been assured that such arrangements have been made.

Our clients inform us that they had in fact been approached by you and had submitted a quotation but that the question of publication was subject to a number of assurances to be given by you. In this connection, a Mr. Freedman, who informs us he is a partner in the firm of Accountants which act for you, telephoned us on 19th February. We discussed with him the question of certain assurances and indemnities which our client would require, and he said he would get in touch with your solicitors. Since then we have heard nothing from them, from Mr. Freedman, or from your solicitors, or from yourself.

Mr. Blatt of the London Caledonian Press informs us that on Friday evening last, 28th February, you telephoned him at his home in connection with our letter to the Sunday Times. He made it quite clear to you that there was no arrangement for publication of your paper, and would not be until certain assurances had been obtained. In these circumstances, we must ask that you write to the Sunday Times immediately confirming that there has in fact never been any agreement by our clients to publish your paper. We must also ask that you let us have a copy of your letter to the Sunday Times, and we must make it clear that our clients reserve their rights against you in the matter.

We are by return of post sending a copy of this letter to the Editor of the Sunday Times.

Yours faithfully, Seifert Sedley & Co. Solicitors, 14, Tooks Court, Curzon St, Chancery Lane, EC4.'
bewildered readers exactly what had happened. Under the heading, The Heavy Jelly Affair, they stressed that their advertisement had no connection whatever with the Island group as the name had already been promised to 'some very good musicians from several groups who want to record together but could not do so under their names because of contractual reasons'. They rounded off by saying, '... when these musicians produce their L P... it should be an important event in British Blues'. Well, Head Records are soon to release this 'important event' with African drums, due out in the first week of April. The title of the record is interesting though; wait for it, yes, it's Time Out (The Long Wait). (FD)

Incidentally, this brave new team of pop predators has taken to censoring its advertisements with such prurient enthusiasm that they are fast becoming known as the Mary Whitehouses of the Underground.

Examining the struggle in Mozambique between the Portuguese colonialists and the local inhabitants is like re-reading some medieval history book. All the hoary (and gory) ingredients of an old-style colonial war are there. Fine cities set along the East Coast of Africa have become fortress of privilege for the settlers from Lisbon. Perhaps there's a touch of the Crusades in it too; the noble sons of Portugal — 70,000 men-at-arms — travel to Darkest Africa to bring Christ and Portuguese culture to the 'uncivilised'. (Especially Christ. A tourist just back from the capital Lourenço Marques said, 'The Portuguese are very religious. Whenever they kick or strike an African they cross themselves afterwards as an apology to God.' As an after thought he said, 'And you see a lot of people crossing themselves in Mozambique.')

The task of freeing Mozambique from Portuguese exploitation is in the hands of Frelimo, the Mozambique liberation movement which operates from the neighbouring state of Tanzania. Before discussing Frelimo's chances of wresting power from the Portuguese, it is appropriate to study the nature of the power of the oppressors.

Portugal itself is an economically and socially bankrupt country. It has Europe's lowest Gross National Product (GNP) and the lowest literacy rate. But it manages to maintain colonies in Africa (Mozambique, Angola and Portuguese Guinea) many, many times its size because it believes in fascism and fascism is a safer alternative to communism — particularly if you are an American State Department official or a gnome in Zurich. And since 1926 when Dr. Salazar came to power fascism has kept Portugal (not to mention Spain) an impoverished, yet stable, country.

Then, of course, Portugal belongs to NATO which means her colonial aberrations give her the tremendous military backing of the United States and Britain. Although the treaty is specifically directed towards peace-keeping north of the Tropic of Cancer, the Portuguese find no difficulty in shifting vast quantities of NATO guns, ammunition and bombs to the war zones in Mozambique.

Portugal's trump, but unplayed, card is her close association with the appalling regimes of Balthazar Vorster (South Africa) and Ian Smith (Rhodesia). As Vorster so glibly put it two years ago: 'We are good friends with both Portugal and Rhodesia. Good friends do not need a pact. Good friends know what their duty is when a neighbour's house is on fire.'

Apart from heavy economic investment in Mozambique, South Africa sends 'advisers' to the fighting areas and hands over a steady supply of arms to help fight the 'common enemy' — kaffirs.

Since UDI the rebel Smith has also become a hero figure to the Portuguese settlers, and they have responded to his cause by permitting sanction-busting traffic to the coast with tobacco and metals. Eighty thousand Rhodesian tourists a year spend their holidays in Mozambique where their passports and currency are still valid.

No one in the liberation movement has any illusions about the might of the enemy. But there is a curious belief that the rightness of their struggle will transcend these massive obstacles to freedom and independence.

Frelimo began in 1962 as a response to a horrible massacre carried out in the northern province of Mueda.

On June 26, 1960, the peasants of the region held a peaceful demonstration to protest against the extreme economic hardship posed by the settlers' labour laws. Portuguese soldiers opened fire on the unarmed crowd killing 500 Africans, more than eight times the number massacred at Sharpeville in South Africa in the same year.

At the first major conference Eduardo Chivambo Mondlane was elected president, a post he was to hold until he was assassinated in Dar es Salaam in January this year.

As a child, Mondlane was peculiarly fortunate. He was able to go to school which was rare for an African. He went to university in South Africa and eventually completed his studies in the United States where he obtained a doctorate in sociology. He then spent five years in the trusteeship department of the United Nations. In 1961, however, he left the soft options of American university life and the corridors of the UN to return to Africa and engage directly in Mozambique's liberation struggle.

It is necessary to spend so much time on Mondlane's background in an attempt to show what special qualities he brought to bear on the character of the movement. As a sociologist, Mondlane was an intense humanist. He saw the role of the party not as strictly a military weapon to stab and slaughter the existing tyrannical order. He fought for a coherent revolutionary strategy of integrated activity in the military, political, economic, social and educational fields. Mondlane always insisted on the importance of education, both academic and political. Through the Mozambique Institute set up in 1963 by...
American wife, Janet, young Mozambique are trained in educational, medical and social programmes. This year there are 200 students who have been assisted by Frelimo studying at university level overseas.

In the brief years of struggle Frelimo has been successful in securing the northern province of Cabo Delgado and Niassa. In these areas one can get a glimpse of the New Order proposed by Frelimo. One of the first reports from the Frelimo-controlled areas said: 'One of the most urgent problems Frelimo is facing is to make good the years of neglect in education. The first step has been to organise primary schools where children can be taught Portuguese, basic literacy and arithmetic, and be given an outline of the history and geography of Mozambique.'

The next stage of the liberation was to set up small clinics and first aid posts: the job of the Frelimo Public Health Department. By the end of 1967, 100,000 people had been vaccinated against smallpox while smaller numbers had been immunised against typhoid, tetanus and tuberculosis. Somehow this programme of revolution seems unreal to twentieth century revolutionaries who have lived with the purges of post-czardist Russia, the anti-revisionism of Mao and the ruthless determination of Ho. But Eduardo Mondlane, blown to pieces by a time bomb, was a different sort of revolutionary.

How successful was he? In July last year the party held its first national conference inside Mozambique. In jungle clearings the leaders and delegates sat down to discuss the future of the struggle. At one time Portuguese aircraft spotted their meeting place and bombed it; but the talks merely shifted to another site and no one was injured. After a week of debate the Frelimo men melted back into the jungles to continue their work — but they had proved to the world that their strength was real.

The only way to break Portugal's colonial grip, however, is to smash economically or politically the regime back in Lisbon.

Mondlane's tactics of military harassment were certainly helping this process. Under Dr Salazar defence spending reached a peak of £145 million. This year with conscription extended to all men between 18 and 45 and the serving period increased from two to three or even four years, the defence budget is likely to eat up 50 per cent of the national budget. The serious effect of this expenditure is reflected in the balance of payments. By the pruning of essential social services, this is still kept in surplus. But the £52 million credit registered at the end of 1967 was down to £25 million for the first nine months of 1968.

How long will this depressed society take these enormously heavy overseas commitments? And as the battle sharpens, what effect will the heavy death toll have on the national conscience? (The Portuguese have officially admitted to 378 dead and 5,500 wounded in fighting to mid-1967. The Johannesburg Star suggested, however, that Portugal is now losing an average of 100 men killed in action each month).

Frelimo's immediate job is to re-group around the Rev Simango, the new president and deliver more decisive military blows on the Portuguese garrison. For this she needs more military support from the Organisation of African Unity, Russia and China.

In Britain, support can only be of a specialised kind. It must be of a political nature and aimed at ending Britain's bland acceptance of Portuguese colonial rule in Africa. There is a long-held tradition in this country that Portugal is 'our oldest ally'. This must end. As Mondlane himself wrote: 'It is not that a change of attitude on the part of the West will alter the outcome of the struggle. But it could, we feel, help to determine the time it may take for us to win.'

There is too much food in the world. Far too much. And the surplus is growing at a terrifying, uncontrollable rate.

Governments try to tackle this crisis by all sorts of restrictions on agricultural output — the most famous of which is the American practice of paying farmers to leave their land uncultivated.

Areas to be cultivated for particular purposes are fixed farm by farm, and are subject to inspection by officials who have grown increasingly anxious, as surpluses have mounted, to check on anyone who is inclined to cheat. On occasion the inspection has taken on features of a military exercise, with the government men engaging in surprise aerial reconnaissance over suspicious fields of corn. Even so, the great flood of produce coming off American farms has not been checked.

In other words, even though the farmers are restricted in the acreage they can cultivate, the problem of excess food still gets worse, because they manage to produce more and more from a smaller and smaller amount of land.

When other means fail, the last resort is destruction. Fields of sugar cane are burnt, baby pigs slaughtered by the million, milk poured down mine shafts, wheat tipped into the sea. Crops are ploughed back into the ground, and fruit left to rot on the trees.

Remember that publicity campaign to keep the Biafran children alive until Christmas was over? Well, just up the road from Biafra, in the Ivory Coast, they were systematically destroying 100,000 tons of coffee. And in Europe, two immense (but by now familiar) crises were coming to a head: the French fruit glut (an annual affair), and the Common Market butter problem.

In France over half a million tons of fruit and vegetables had to be destroyed. Fruit was tipped on to the roads by the lorryload, and tourists having to drive through this sticky mush were handed free gifts of peaches, together with protest leaflets. Grapes were dumped into rivers, abandoned at the roadside, and occasionally thrown by frustrated farmers at government buildings.

As for the Common Market's dairy problems, the Financial Times commented: 'the butter surplus seems to be a problem almost beyond the wit of man to solve'. What could the EEC farm bosses do about their 350,000 tons excess butter? They thought of feeding it back to the cows, but that would cause the cows to supply more milk, resulting in a worse situation. Even as things stand, next year's dairy surplus is expected to be more disastrous than ever (ie: bigger). They thought of getting rid of the stuff at half-price, but people in Europe are already eating enough butter, and couldn't consume much more, even if it was that cheap.

They thought of turning the butter into something that couldn't spread, then presenting it as some new product and trying to sell it that way. They still haven't sorted the problem out, and sooner or later they will almost certainly be forced to slaughter a lot of dairy cows — probably four million out of the Common Market's 22 million.

Of course, we all know that there are quite a few hungry people in the world, and for this reason talk of 'too much' food being a 'problem' seems ludicrous and bizarre. Those who admire Black Comedy can be recommended to read almost any material on agricultural economics. It is usually wildly hilarious, to a degree only possible with an undertone of stark horror. Picking on a couple of standard economics textbooks at random, I find the following gems:

'Unfortunately, with the help of fertilizers, modern chemicals and irrigation, some farmers managed to maintain their normal output on reduced acreage and receive the federal payment too.'

'It's the 'Unfortunately' that kills you.'

(The restrictive Agriculture Acts of the early thirties were) 'merely interim measures until the bounty of nature again became an embarrassment.'

A beautifully coy way of putting it.

Quotes such as these are beyond the imaginative powers of a Kafka. Capitalism's insanity is so systematic, and such an everyday thing, that it is impossible to satirize. It is its own caricature. My favourite quote of the lot is from a 1958 Press Release of the Food and Agriculture Organization. Here, the problem of too much food is described as though it were a dangerous epidemic, a Black Death sweeping over the world:

'The 30th session of the Committee on Commodity Problems ended yesterday after almost two weeks of discussions on what it termed a grave situation for international commerce in agricultural products.

The discussions of the 24-member committee have stressed the concern of delegates at the deterioration of the world agricultural economy. Accumulation of surpluses, contraction of international markets, the fall of world prices for most products and the slowing down of general economic activity were the chief factors involved. It was also noted that the chronic presence of surpluses had spread to new products and additional countries. The outlook was rather dark, and the attention of governments was drawn to the urgent need for measures to alleviate the situation. . . . At the same time it was recognized that from now on the problem of surpluses should be considered as a permanent characteristic of the world agricultural economy.

If there is too much food, if there is a volcano of plenty threatening to engulf humanity, it would seem to follow that the thing to save the situation would be a colossal natural (or unnatural) catastrophe. And this is in fact the case. The present system of society, choking in its own abundance, would be perked up no end by a world-wide series of super-earthquakes, or some disastrous fallout of nuclear pollution. Anything that destroyed men, machines and materials in a really big way would provide a welcome shot in the arm. You cannot sell something unless it's scarce.

As a matter of fact, that isn't as fanciful as it sounds. The big American drought of 1934 was a tremendous boon, reducing the wheat crop more effectively than any government action, and letting Agriculture Secretary Henry Wallace off the hook. It was reported that he breathed a sigh of relief; it would not be necessary to write about the logic of ploughing up wheat while millions lacked bread.

That, of course, took place during a depression. 'Overproduction' has always been a feature of slumps. What is new about the modern overproduction of food is that it is permanent, chronic, continuing through boom and slump alike. In 1947 Marx and Engels described the crises of plenty as follows:

"In these crises there breaks out an epidemic that in all earlier epochs would have seemed an absurdity — the epidemic of overproduction. Society suddenly finds itself put back into a state of momentary barbarism; it appears as if famine, a universal war of devastation had cut off the supply of every means of subsistence: industry and commerce seem to be destroyed, and why? Because there is too much civilization, too much means of subsistence, too much industry, too much commerce. And how does the bourgeoisie get over these crises? On the one hand by enforced destruction of a mass of productive forces; on the other, by the conquest of new markets, and by the more thorough exploitation of the old ones. That is to say, by paving the way for more extensive and more destructive crises, and by diminishing the means whereby crises are prevented."

The reason for today's permanent surplus of food in all the advanced countries is rather different. If governments stopped interfering in agriculture, food prices would dive and farmers would be going broke all over the place. Farming would become a permanently depressed sector (as it was in America during the twenties boom). Men, machines and land would move out of agriculture into other uses. This would keep on until food prices rose again to a profitable level. Governments are not prepared to let this happen, for they can't prevent food prices from falling.

This sort of policy can have laughable consequences on a world scale. Thus, European governments subsidize the growing of sugar beet. At the moment the Common Market has a big headache with its million ton sugar surplus, whilst in Cuba they've just introduced sugar rationing.

I suppose there will be someone innocent enough to ask: 'How can there possibly be too much food in the world, when so many people are starving?' Such a person has not yet realized that in a buying and selling world, a world which produces for the sake of cash, human needs can go and get stuffed. Money talks; hunger is dumb. People are starving all right, not because there isn't any food for them, but because they've got no money to buy it. In other words: 'too much' means 'too much for a profitable market' not too much for human needs.

Actually, starvation isn't as widespread as a lot of people think. Those who put it about that there is some sort of 'overpopulation problem' still bring up the old myth that 'two-thirds of the world are underfed.' It would be truer to say that two-thirds of the world suffer from malnutrition — one-third from under-eating, one-third from over-eating.

The idiocy of the money system is illustrated by what happened when America decided to give some of its surplus wheat away to India. This is just the sort of thing some woolly-minded Humanists advocate. The effect was, of course, to hinder the development of Indian agriculture, and also to keep out exports of rice from Burma and wheat from Argentine, aggravating hardship in both these countries. Ironically, both Burma and Argentine get American aid. When surplus American corn was handed out in Israel, this cut the price of Israeli eggs (Hens eat corn). Israeli eggs were exported at prices so low that the European egg market was upset. Giving things away, within a buying and selling system, doesn't work.

In a Moneyless World there would be no difficulty about improving farming in backward areas, and transporting food out to them at the same time, but under Capitalism these two obviously sensible actions are in direct conflict with each other.

Similarly, I suppose most people are now aware that there's a certain amount of starvation in the USA, the richest nation in the world's history. The Observer mentioned this last August, and incidentally gave us another gem for our collection of Real Life Sick Gags: a Senator James Eastland opposes welfare hand-outs which he calls 'giving something for nothing', whilst he gets £1,000 a week from the government for not growing cotton on his plantation.

Why can't the US government simply open its granaries to the poor of America? Because even the poor, if they eat at all, pay for what they eat, and if they get their food free, they will no longer spend money on food, so the price of food will tumble down and the farmers will be hit. You can't operate bits of sanity inside an insane system.

DAVID RAMSAY STEELE.

Late one afternoon, Harvard’s Professor of Social Relations sat cross-legged in his sitting room floor, saying goodbye to a stream of LSE students who were using the off-Kings Road house as a temporary home for their tutorials. Professor Norman Zinberg ‘possibly the World’s greatest expert on the smoking of cannabis’ (Sunday Times) had decided not to drink the Martini that is a customary tonic prior to his frequent journeys – the next morning he and his wife were off on African safari – until after he had finished talking!

The American magazine Science has published the results of the first truly scientific test ever made on the subject of pot, and after meeting Professor Zinberg, who is in England as Visiting Professor of Social Psychology at the London School of Economies, it was not difficult to see that he will play a significant role in bringing the issue into the open – then the myths about pot will not persist and Government Officials will have to revise their attitudes to the so-called ‘problem’ of ‘drug’ use.

Z. Let me tell you something which I think will interest you about experimental work in this area. Not only is there an overwhelming problem based on the legal position making it very hard to start any kind of research, but people suspect you because you’re doing research in this field. The other night* the first question I was asked was ‘Do you use pot?’

I felt that this was the most definitive question of the evening it was really a question of establishing your credentials. If you are a drug user then anything you say cannot mean anything, and if you’re not – are you afraid of it, of what? It’s one of those questions where you start pissing on the toilet seat. You know, you’re damned if you do it, and damned if you don’t. I find, in this field it is difficult to establish yourself as a reasonably objective person. Arguments are thrown at you at every possible chance and in every possible way.

We found, in working with naive subjects, (those who had never seen or smoked pot) and chronic users (those who had smoked pot daily for at least two years) that, instead of working like alcohol, where people have to learn to hold their liquor, with marijuana, as you become accustomed to its effects, it takes less, down to a specific base line, to enable you to get high. This is what is known as ‘reverse tolerance’.

We felt, on the basis of the information from users and from our experimental data, that it wasn’t question of chemical accumulation with chronic users. It was too consistent. They took just about the same amount, depending on body weight and what-have-you, to get them high. It didn’t seem to matter how many years they had smoked.

C. Hardin B Jones, Professor of Medical Physics & Physiology at the University of California, argues that there is strong evidence for physiological, mental and social deterioration associated with prolonged use of Pot, and that accumulation of small doses injures the body and mind.

Z. I think it would be very difficult to postulate an accumulation hypothesis given the kind of data we recovered after our experiments. To have such a hypothesis you would have to postulate a very complex chemical retention system – only retaining so much and no more – roughly on the basis of enzymatic action or endocrine action, or what-have-you that it was bound to a certain tension level. A very difficult hypothesis!

C. What action do you think cannabis has on the central nervous system?

Z. I don’t really have a clue.

But I do think we know a lot about cannabis and I do hate it when people say, ‘Well I can’t have an opinion because we are so ignorant.

We know a lot of things, and a lot of people have used cannabis for quite some time, and if we don’t know enough it’s because we haven’t allowed ourselves to look. On the other hand when it comes to the actual action – what makes up intoxication – what brain centres are involved – I think we truly don’t know. For that matter, we don’t know that much about alcohol.

We felt, from our experiments, that it was probably the higher brain centres that were affected – the centres that control abstract and reasoning capacities rather than the brain centres which tend to be more automated and control lawfulness, regularity and what-have-you. That might explain why a chronic user could do a test like the Digit Symbol Substitution Test (that is replacing numbers with symbols) rather well, and perhaps would do badly in the Speech Sample, when he turns back on his own imagination and abstract thinking – but that’s all hypothesis.

C. From your experiences could you say whether alcohol was physiologically more harmful than cannabis?

Z. Well, physiologically I would think that cannabis is the less harmful. The thing is that it’s hard to compare dosages. We take in a great deal of alcohol – we ingest it for one thing – and with ingestion we have much less ability to judge how much has been taken in. By the time you have absorbed it and it has gone to the blood *at the meeting of the Society for the Study of Addiction where Professor Zinberg read the second part of his paper, Clinical and Psychological Effect of Marijuana in Man.

stream then to higher centres of the brain, you have taken in a great deal more than you think — I don’t know if it has happened to you, but it has happened to me once or twice!

When you have smoked cannabis you really know rather quickly how much has been absorbed and what the response is, probably in a very few minutes, so you are unlikely to take a consistent over-dose. The only way you would be able to make a valid comparison between cannabis and alcohol, is if you really gave people consistent over-doses of ingested cannabis over long periods of time, to see whether or not, at that level, it would have a great deal of effect relative to all the various physiological effects. I think the comparison of alcohol with cannabis doesn’t really get anybody anywhere. If I were to say that cannabis is less harmful than alcohol, people would say, ‘But under what conditions’. The conditions under which people smoke cannabis in this country — the average user — I would say, takes cannabis only once or twice a week, and considers himself a regular user — what is smoked amounts to only a very small dose. If you consider that regular use, occasional low dosage, you are talking about quite a different phenomenon from even the man who has three drinks before dinner every night — and doesn’t in any way consider himself as an alcoholic!

C. In that case, why is there such hysterical reaction to pot from the general public?

Z. Well, I guess that the only offering hypothesis prevalent at the moment is that it threatens peoples concepts of social order, individual psychic order, and that it offers some concept of hedonism, and so on. I don’t think this is true, but I think in a way pot users have sold this idea to the other people, and I think they have also promised more than is true to themselves and to others. This whole idea of mutual disappointment has a lot to do with the kind of pressures that are involved. I don’t really understand it yet, and it’s what I want to find out.

If you try to talk to people who are intelligent and reasonable or in legislative positions, they say that cannabis is bad because it releases aggression. You say, well no, it is really more of a tranquilliser. Then they say, it leads to other drugs. Then you point out — I point out — that from the findings of my experiments it results in 'reversed tolerance', and for cannabis to lead to other drugs would mean increased tolerance rather than decreased tolerance. Therefore, it is unlikely, in the classical sense of a drug progression, — growing tolerance, dissatisfaction & greater craving — that it does lead to other drugs. On the other hand, in the sense of so called 'horizontal' drug use, that is, where you are thrown in with other people and obtain your cannabis in a certain way so as to be in contact with other drugs, and if you are a curious person, you might want to try other things. Then, they say, ‘what is going to happen to society if everybody uses drugs and drops out?’ Then you have to differentiate! Are they dropping out because they use drugs, or does the use of drugs in society result in people dropping out? A hard question to answer. It’s a result of the present social situation, not a cause of it. I don’t think at this point we can answer in a Yes or No way.

Certainly the other half say that people drop out and use drugs because they feel depressed and are concerned about the social situation. The fact is that, increasingly, I’ve seen so many middle-class people who do use drugs, and don’t drop out. They don’t get picked up by the Law. Their drug use is discreet and careful. They think that their chances of being in trouble with the law, except by the greatest kind of fluke, are as close to zero as possible. Therefore, when you do find a group who use their drug use as a reason to drop out, you have to lock further and deeper which is not all that simple.

Each year I think this is more true, and for some reason it seems that these people that drop out, do find something for themselves in the definition of being deviants which has been put upon them, and once it’s put upon them, somehow or another it fits.

C. It seems, from what you have been saying that the 'Pot culture' could be described as an expressive social movement.

Z. Again, that involves a differentiation between the actual effects of the drug, the personality of the user before he becomes a user, and then the impact of the person being defined by his larger society as a social deviant, of how this eventually affects his definition of himself. There is, I think, a lot of evidence that the third hypothesis, if not explanatory of the whole situation, is certainly a very important point. It is a problem of a self-fulfilling prophecy and I think I may make myself very unpopular by saying that the thing that most strikes me about it all is how opinionated people are on both sides, and how difficult it is to have a relatively objective view. But certainly the authorities who are still upright make it impossible for anything to happen and I’ll tell you a funny story.

The other night I was invited to a dinner party to meet a very prominent English Minister. There were six men in the room as I walked in, all of us having separated ourselves from the ladies for coffee & brandy after dinner! I walked in and he was introduced to me. In a friendly and generous manner I was introduced as being here to do a study on drug use. The famous man then turned to me and asked me, in a very pleasant way whether I thought there was any important difference in drug use in Great Britain and the United States. And I said innocuously: well, to tell the truth I think there is astonishingly little difference — I have

I think it gives you some idea of the extent of the prejudice in that direction. Now to go to the other side of it.

Recently I was talking to somebody who you would, I guess, have to describe as a head, and I said: 'I do think that some of the people we work with like the chronic users have gotten too far out. I can't tell whether they were far out when they started using it, but they had been using some form of cannabis almost daily for three to four years, and I have had trouble talking to them. You know, we didn't really quite connect, in the sense that sometimes people connect. They were intellectually sound, they were working and doing okay, but I'm sure they felt the reason we didn't connect was my fault. The kinds of images they used - and it wasn't just pot-like images - but the philosophical images around Zen and abstractions - I found circumstantial and I found it difficult to establish communication'. This Head got mad at me too, when I said that.

He said that I was really sticking to Western thought and western civilisation, and that my interest in talking to him was scientific. Science was the cause of all the trouble and it indicated that there was an invariant reality and the truth was that there wasn't an invariant reality - and he went on like this. And so I couldn't really talk to this man any better than I could talk to the Minister on his moral grounds.

I still don't understand why everybody is so uptight about the issue, and really what I'm trying to do is study this and try to understand why it has become such an emotional issue. If in fact the drug, as you suggest, and lots of people suggest, is a relatively mild drug - let's say that it is - than the fact that on both sides people are so uptight about it, becomes even more remarkable.

What could this post-industrial society look like? I want to emphasize that it is on this project that so many more people could become totally involved in the revolutionary process. If it would be by & large intellectuals, academics and students who would work on the analysis & critique of the growing corporation feudalism, it would be people from all walks of life who would be essential to this second necessity. You need men & women with years of experience in farming, small business, teaching, city planning, recreation, medicine, and on & on, to start discussing & writing about ways to organize that part of society they know best for a post-industrial America. You need to provide outlets via forums, discussions, papers and magazines for the post-up plans & ideals of literally millions of well-trained, experienced, frustrated Americans who see stupidity & greed all around them but can’t do a thing about it. You need to say, for example, “Look Mr & Mrs City Planning Expert trapped in this deadly bureaucracy controlled by big businessmen, draw up a sensible plan for street development, or park development, in your town of 30,000 people.” “Look, Mr Blue Collar Worker, working for the big corporation, how should this particular plant be run in a sensible society?”

And, you need not only to discuss & to develop these programs, you need to make them clear to every American, not only to those directly affected by these plans that are present system disgusts them morally, or exploits them, or ignores them, or rejects them. No, even more, you need to reach the many millions more who, once they did not fear you or distrust you, would be willing to live under either the new or old system. And make no mistake about their importance. When people talk about the small percentage of Bolsheviks who took over Russia, they often forget the overwhelming numbers who passively accepted them, in that case out of disgust with war, despair, and the lack of a plan of their own that they really believed in.

Let me repeat to make its importance clearer: the neutralization of large masses should be a prime goal for a program to develop & present blueprints for a post-industrial America. To this end it should be personally handed by some one revolutionary to every person in America. Each person should receive a short, simple, one-page handbill especially relevant to his situation or occupation. It would begin, for example, “Policeman, standing here protecting us from Evil at this demonstration, where will you be after the revolution?” And after these short sentences you will tell this bewildered soul, whom you embraced after handing him his message, that there will still be a great need for policemen after the revolution, but that policemen will tend to do more of the things that they like to do—helping, assisting, guiding—rather than the things that get them a bad name, to wit, faithfully carrying out the repressive dictates of their power elite masters. You will tell him that you know that some policemen are prejudiced or authoritarian, but you know that’s neither here nor there, because orders on whether to shoot (“to do whatever is necessary to keep ‘law & order’ in this ghetto”) or not to shoot come from officials higher up who are intimately intertwined in the corporate system.

Similar handbills should be prepared for every person. Some would hear good things, like more money & better health. Some would hear things that would surprise them or make them wonder, like: You won’t be socialized, Mr Small Businessman producing a novelty or retailing pets on a local level, because the socialized corporations can produce more than enough; and furthermore, keep in mind that government in a post-industrial America couldn’t possibly harass you as much as the big bankers who won’t lend you money, the big corporations who undercut you, and the corporate-oriented politicians who overtax you.

Others, for whom there is no good news would get such cheery messages as Mr. Insurance Man we hope you have other skills, like gardening or typing; ”Corporate Manager—we hope you like working for the anonymous public good as much as you liked working for anonymous millionaire coupon clippers; ”CLA Man—we hope you are as good at hiding as you are supposed to be at sneaking”.

Perhaps most of all, there has to be a consideration of the role of Mr John Bircher, Mr Physician, Mr Dentist and others now on the New Right. They who are put off or ignored by the increasing corporatization have to be shown that their major values — individuality, freedom local determination — are also the values of a post-industrial America. This does not mean they will suddenly become revolutionaries, but it is important to start them wondering as to whether or not they would find things as bad in the new social system as they do in this system which increasingly annoys them, exasperates them, and ignores them. They must see warnings from the handful of large corporations & multi-millionaires who use them for their own end by talking competition while practicing monopoly, by screaming about taxes while paying very little, and by talking individualism while practicing collectives.

What would a post-industrial America look like? First of all, it would be certain American institutions writ large — like the Berkeley food Co-op that is locally controlled by consumers, like the Pasadena water & gas company that is publicly owned like the Tennessee Valley Authority which has allowed the beginnings of the sane, productive and beautiful development of at least one river region in our country. In short, the system would start from local controls and work up, as it used to before all power & taxes were swept to the national level, mostly by war and the big corporations.

And, as you can see, it would be a mixed system, sometimes with control by consumers, sometimes with control by local government, sometimes with control by regional authorities, and sometimes — as should be made clear in the handbill to certain small businessmen — with control in private hands. For many retail franchises, for many novelty production, and, I suspect, for many types of farms & farmers, depending on region, crop involved and other considerations, private enterprise may be the best way.

The question will be raised — is this promise of some private ownership panaderie to a voting bloc? Is it like the old Communist trick of the United Front? The answer is a resounding NO. A post-industrial society that does not maximize chances for freedom, flexibility and individuality is not worth fighting for. Given the enormous capabilities of corporate production, the economic & cultural insignificance of most small businessmen, and the very small number of family farmers, there is simply no economic or political or cultural reason to socialize everything. There is no “kulak” class, there is no “petty bourgeois”. Pre-industrial societies may have had to socialize everything to defend their revolutions against hostile forces, but that is only another way in which your situation differs from theirs.

I have left the most obvious for last. Of course the corporations would be socialized. Their money would go to all people in lower prices (and thus higher real wages) and/or repair to local, state and national treasuries in the amounts necessary to have a park on every corner (replacing one of the four gas stations), and medical, dental, educational or arts facilities on the other corners replacing the other three gas stations — there being no need for any but a few gas stations due to the ease of introducing electric cars, when a few hundred thousand rich people are not in a position to interfere). But how do we man this huge corporation enterprise? First, with blue-collar workers, who would be with you all the way in any showdown no matter how nice some members of the corporate rich have been to them lately. Second, with men from lower-level management positions who have known up the rat race, wised up, and tacitly awaited your revolution.
The Plan: Psychic Guerrilla Warfare

I come then, finally to the third necessity, a program for taking the reins of government away from the power elite in order to carry out the plan developed by revolutionary visionaries. It is on this point that there is likely to be found the most disappointment, the most confusion, the most uncertainty and the most fear. But I think you do have something very important to go on - the ideas & experiences & successes of the Civil Rights & New Left & Hippie movements of the past several years. If they have not given you an analysis of corporation capitalism or a set of blueprints, which is their weakness, they have given you the incredibly precious gifts of new forms of struggle and new methods of reaching people, and these gifts must be generalized, articulated and more fully developed.

I have a general term, borrowed from a radical hippy, that I like to use because it so beautifully encapsulates what these movements have given to you: "Psychic Guerrilla Warfare" - the "psychic" part appealing to my psychologist instincts and summarizing all hard-hitting non-violent methods, the "guerrilla" part hopefully giving to those who want to take to the hills enough measure of satisfaction to allow them to stick around & participate in the only type of guerrilla warfare likely to work in corporate America. For make no mistake, this kind of psychic warfare is a real weapon in a well-educated, sedate, highly industrialized country that has a tradition of liberal values & democratic political processes. And it is the kind of guerrilla warfare that America's great new acting-out girls can indulge in on an equal basis with any male anywhere. It is the confrontation politics of the New Left-teach-ins, marches walk-ins, sit-ins, push-ins, love-ins, folk rocks and be-ins. It is the non-violent, religious, democratically-inspired confrontations of the morality of Martin Luther King, and it is the unfolding good humor, psychological analysis and flower power of the Hippies. Together they are dynamite - what politician or labor leader can fail to smile or admit begrudging admiration for the best in American hippiedom?

How do you direct this dynamite to its task of destroying the ideological cover of the corporate rich? First, you start a new political party, a wide-open, locally-based political party dedicated to the development of blueprints for a post-industrial America guerrilla warfare. It should be a party open to anyone prepared to abandon all other political affiliations & beliefs - in other words, it would not be an Anti-This-Or-That coalition of liberal Democrats, Communists, Trotskyists and Maoists. In fact, ignore those groups. The best members will drop out & join yours. For the rest, they have non constituencies and would soon fall to fighting the Old Fights among themselves anyway - Communist & Anti-Communist, Pro & Anti-Soviet, and On & On ad infinitum. No, you don't need that - it would destroy you like it destroyed them. In fact, they need you, for if you got something going the party would be big enough for all of them to work in without seeing each other or having to defend the old Faiths.

Fantasy? Perhaps, but don't under-estimate the cynicism at minor levels of the techno-structure. I have spoken with & to these groups, and there is hope. They are not all taken in, any more than most Americans are fooled by the mass media about domestic matters. They are just trapped, with no place to go but out if they think too much or make a wave. Now, "out" is easy enough if you're young & single, but it's a little sticky if you didn't wake up to the whole corporate absurdity until you were long out of college and had a wife & two kids. Cultivate these well-educated men & women whose talents are wasted & ill-used. Remind them that the most revolutionary thing they can do is stop feeding you information & money so you can further expose the system, and aside from helping to plan the post-industrial society - is to be in a key position in the technosstructure when the revolution comes. You may not win many of them percentages, but then it wouldn't take many to help you through a transition.

Then too, part of the corporate system would disappear - one computerized system of banking & insurance would eliminate the incredible duplication, paperwork and nonsense now existent in those two "highly profitable" but worthless areas of the corporate economy. Corporate retails would be broken up & given to local consumer co-ops, or integrated into localized producer/retailer units in one of two ways: Corporate transports (air, rails, buses) would be given in different cases to state, local and national government, as well as to, on occasion, offensively armed retailers or producers they believe utilities, as earlier hinted, would finally be given to the public, mostly on the local & regional level, probably on the national level in the case of telephones. The only real problem, I think, is manufacturing, where you have the concentration of technicians & workers to survive a transition. Blue collar control - syndicalism could be the answer in some cases, regional or national government control in others. Here, obviously, is one of those questions that needs much study, with blue collar & white collar workers in the various industries being the key informants & ideas men.

In addition to declining offers of coalition, and instead seeking converts, such a party should reject as inappropriate the Leninist "democratic centralism" for an American revolutionary party. Not that all the Old Lefties would give it up - some would probably join your party and try to "cursus" or "bore from within", but the open give & take of ideas and the local autonomy of chapters could handle the little organizational games they have become so good at while organizing & reorganizing each other over the past 30 or 40 years.

So what does this party do besides present a constant withering critique of corporation capitalism and build blueprints for a post-industrial America? It practices all forms of psychic guerrilla warfare wherever & whenever it is possible convert. Eventually, and on the right occasions, it enters elections, not to win votes at first, but to win converts. In making its pitch, it doesn't ask men & women to quit their day jobs or take to the hills, but rather it asks them to make their allegiances to new socioeconomic arrangements, to help develop new social & intellectual institutions, to financially support the growth of the party, to read party-orientated newspapers, to convert & neutralize friends & neighbours, and to stand firm if the corporate rich try something funny.

After building chapters in every town or city district in the country by word of mouth and small group contact, you would gradually begin to participate in local elections to gain further attention. Then you would enter legislative elections, both to gain converts and to win seats, for the more legislative seats you hold, state & national, the better for the sudden takeover that will come later. You avoid like the plague winning any executive offices, for to be a major or governor when you don't control the whole system as meaningless and a waste of energy. You shouldn't do anything liberals won't eventually do until you control the presidency. In other words, I'm not suggesting a gradual takeover, which would wear you down, compromise your program and perhaps allow you to develop an ameliorist mentality as you get used to a little bit of influence & status. Indeed, the British Labour Party should be as sad a lesson to you as any other recent experience, and you should not repeat their failure to force a total & complete change the minute you take power. If they couldn't do it, well, you can, because once you take over the Presidency in a one-election shot, there is enough power concentrated there to accomplish drastic changes overnight. In short, the corporate rich are absolutely dependent upon the executive branch to keep their economic system from depression and collapse.

I don't mean to imply that you would only control the Presidency, that you would only move on the national level. Actually, you should move on the whole system at once, for the local chapter would have developed locally that would also enter elections for the first time when you decided you had the popular support to win the Presidency. All members of a given chapter would train themselves to fill nationalized government job at local levels, thus creating a shadow cabinets of British politics only more so. The transition would be sudden - one election - and it would be total in the sense of taking money power and status from the corporate rich.
A startling expose of the methods of the Press Council is contained in a recent Solidarity pamphlet 'Damned' by Andy Andersof. Anderson is secretary of the Friends of King Hill, a direct action group that scored a notable victory over Kent County Council's treatment of homeless families in 1966. The group exposed official callousness, victimisation and inhumanity in hostels that one MP compared to concentration camps.

At the height of the campaign, The People newspaper ran an article headed Don't Waste Your Pity On This Phoney Martyr. The puff for it said:

Everyone was sorry for poor Mrs Mills, the man in the hostel row. But read the full facts... Today for the first time, The People reveals the full story about Mr Mills. It exposes him as nothing more than a phoney martyr. (2/1/66)

Three days later they received an astonishing 1700 word letter from Paul. He had arbitrarily split the complaints into three categories:

A. Substantial complaints which might or might not be subject to adjudication. (8 complaints).

B. Complaints 'consequential in character' to the first eight, which were not 'challenges of statements of fact' but complaints about 'unjustified comment'. If the council 'sees fit to adjudicate' on the first eight it would 'naturally deal with some or all of the eight complaints in this category.

C. 'Complaints about which I (Paul) am unable to find anything substantial and which would not be presented to the council. Twenty-three complaints were relegated to this category.

It was an appalling situation. Not only had the Press Council, through Paul, claimed to be the final arbiters of the matter (by insisting that the Friends signed the 'legal document')—but it was painfully apparent that the complaints would go under the virtual censorship of Noel S Paul, and against whose decisions there could be no appeal.

We have a selection from the correspondence limiting it to the original People statement, the Friends complaints and the subsequent and awe inspiring acrobatics of Mr Noel S Paul, in selecting which of the 39 complaints were to be considered. Mr Paul, at the time a 'secretary' to the Council, has since trodden the primrose path to 'assistant Secretary' (1967), and in 1968 he was appointed Secretary in place of the retiring Col. WC Clissitt.

Category A

Untrue. No-one had ever given the family accommodation, there had always been rent to pay. A Mr Hopkins put the family up, and asked for 'about 10s per week' towards gas and electricity, which the Mills paid.

2. A complaint about words attributed to Mr Hopkins, who was quoted as saying that he let the Mills family one room in the house and...
... when they left, our new settee and the mattresses and bedclothes had to be destroyed. The People, 2.1.66.

This was a flagrant lie. Hopkins made the following statement to two of the Friends on 9 Jan 66:

1. Brian William Hopkins of (address) have at no time stated that after Mr Roy Mills and Mrs Mildred Mills left my house my new settee and the mattresses and bedclothes had to be destroyed' as stated in The People on Sunday 2 January 1966, nor is it true that because of the Mills family I had to destroy a settee and matresses and bedclothes.

In a letter to the editor of the People Hopkins made a similar statement, but the Press Council made no further reference to this complaint.

3. 'A stream of social workers and welfare officers have tried to help the Mills family. Their aid has either been ignored or thrown back in their faces . . .

This too was a distortion. No social workers or welfare workers ever visited the Mills.

4. 'A woman social worker called on Mrs Mills to help her plan her household budget properly. When Mr Mills discovered this service did not include the lady doing the family's housework and shopping, he told her to go.' The People, 2.1.66.

Another lie. The woman was in fact a Home Help, forbidden by the terms of her employment to help with budgeting or to handle money. Elderly and untrained, she did little housework. Mrs Mills real problem was budgeting, and although her husband made a special request for expert help it was never provided. When Mrs Mills got a job, the Home Help was removed because it was against the County's rules. Even Mr W E Allison, the Kent official who gave so much information to The People, said later the service was withdrawn because Mrs Mills declared her intention to go to work in a factory.'

5. The People article stated that a Mrs Molly Riley had said that, when the Mills family were homeless, she had let them two rooms in her house. According to The People, Mrs Riley said that she and her husband had been through some hard times themselves and . . .

... we felt we ought to help this family. We decided we could let them have the two top rooms in the house. The rent was 30s. a week, plus half the gas and electricity bills. The Millises stayed for six months, paid the rent intermittently and contributed a total of £1 to the gas and electricity bills. The People, 2.1.66.

The Friends accusation that this passage contained downright lies was supported by a statement signed by Mrs Molly Riley on 9 January 66 and formally witnessed by the doctor and the civil servant referred to above.

Mrs Riley completely denied having made a number of the remarks attributed to her in The People article. She said:

'I, Mrs Molly Riley, of (address), do hereby state that Mr Roy Mills and Mrs Mildred Mills were not our tenants at any time. There was never any question of them paying rent to me or my husband. Nor was there at any time any agreement about paying for the gas and electricity . . .'

Category 'B'

6. Some of the complaints in Paul's category B were just as serious, but these too were to be rejected by the Press Council (if, in fact, they ever saw them.) Here are two examples.

... Over a period of eight years Mr Mills and his family have received more help than any other family in the country. The People, 2.1.66.

This was patently untrue, a sweeping statement for which there could be no evidence. However it certainly shows The People's heavy hand in developing the picture of Mills as a 'phony martyr.'

7. 'Mr Mills fuses the electricity meter whenever possible.'

This sweeping statement is based on one conviction some years before. It neglects to add that at the time Mills was suffering severe injuries, and had been unemployed for some months. While digging in his garden, he set off a wartime cannon shell, and suffered shrapnel injuries. The court recognised his difficulties and sentenced him to two years probation. The People made no mention of this, but the malicious intent is obvious.

Category 'C'

Finally, some examples of the complaints Paul rejected, and which therefore would not be presented to the Council. His excuses are threadbare to the extreme.

Objection was raised to People reporter Patricia Elston's methods in gathering material for the article. Facts were distorted or omitted. In line with the general editorial instructions she had received, Elston visited Mr Mills, and after telling him that the article would be a hard-hitting description of the plight of the homeless, she got her interview. More seriously, she visited KCC officials, who broke their own rules in giving private information about the homeless. She attributed statements to people which were the very opposite of what they had said to her.

Paul's answer to this complaint was short — 'I am unable to find any grounds on which to seek an adjudication.'

Another complaint was directed against The People's claim to be giving 'the full facts' about Mills, which was very far from the truth — for example the following quote:

'Then Mr Mills had an accident and was off work'. The People, 2.1.66.

the paper's passing reference to Mills cannon shell accident and resulting long period of unemployment. The incident itself had serious repercussions in Mr Mills' life. But Paul's reason for rejecting this complaint:

'What comprises a 'full story' is entirely a matter of opinion. That a 'full story' is not in someone else's opinion of sufficient extent does not provide grounds for complaint.'

'Mr Mills is the despair of all the people who have tried to help him. And yet he dares to play the martyr.' The People, 2.1.66.

This was quite untrue — another sneer at Mr Mills. For a start, the 40 members of the Friends of King Hill did not 'despair' of him. Paul's reply

... many people may have a high opinion of Mr Mills and his family, but that does not extinguish the newspaper's right to make the statements here given.'

'The Kent County Council gave him a council house. Eventually, even the council's patience was exhausted and in 1962 Mr Mills was turned out for non-payment of rent.' The People, 2.1.66.

This was a false fact, designed to restore the Kent County Council's tarnished image. In fact the house belonged to Maidstone Borough Council. Important facts were omitted.

— Mills was still suffering from the shell accident and that the arrears were only £20 (and paid in full 3 weeks after eviction). Paul's reply:

'Although it may be (I have not investigated the point) that the wrong housing authority has been named, the error, if it is one, clearly does not inflict injury on anyone.'

The Friends wrote back angrily that the complaint illustrated the general inaccuracy of the article, in that the council was hardly 'patient' under the circumstances.

'Again the Kent County Council took pity on them and allowed Mrs Mills and her children into the West Malling Hostel.' The People, 2.1.66.

Another attempt to restore the Kent County Council's image. There was no 'pity' involved. The KCC had a statutory duty under the National Assistance Act to provide accommodation.

Noel Paul's excuse for excluding this complaint was that ... the expression 'took pity' in the context, even if it were considered inappropriate, would not be a substantial matter of complaint.'

'Mrs Mills has three rooms (in King Hill Hostel), with cooking facilities and the use of a communal room.' The People, 2.1.66.

In fact there was no communal room. The Friends campaign demanded the provision of such a room. One MP had described the Hostel as 'like a prison camp.'

Paul's reply:
The only challenge here seems to be in respect of the communal room. The injurious nature of this statement, if it is incorrect, is not apparent...

Kent County Council should do one more act of kindness — they should put the Mills children into a home. Then they should kick Mrs Mills out of the Hostel. The People, 2.1.66.

The KCC had already been pursuing this policy for years — setting an all-Britain record for children in care over the past 14 years. The King Hill Campaign put a complete stop to this inhuman policy. This too, was totally false and misleading.

Mrs Mills has been in the Hostel longer than the three-month maximum period — so the Council does not take the £1 2s 6d rent. Her husband is staying with yet another kind-hearted well-wisher — and he pays no rent either. The People, 2.1.66.

Another distortion. Mrs Mills was defying the rules by staying in the Hostel, and the Council could not accept the rent because it would nullify trespassing charges being brought against the squatters. At the same time, Mr Mills was paying rent where he was staying, and a statement was produced to this effect.

Mrs Mills has been in the Hostel longer than the three-month maximum period — so the Council does not take the £1 2s 6d rent. Her husband is staying with yet another kind-hearted well-wisher — and he pays no rent either. The People, 2.1.66.

If the statement was false and distorted, the Friend s produced a statement from the woman in question to show that the rent was much less than £5, and for it she received full board for herself and her two children (whom the People had not mentioned.)

Paul’s reply:

It would seem appropriate to describe a lady with two children as a woman. The failure to mention the existence of the children does not affect the accuracy of the statement in the newspaper.

The Press Council is satisfied that the article in The People contained no substantial inaccuracy and the complaint that it was vicious, malicious and grossly inaccurate is rejected.

A group of agitators had ‘initiated against Pat Elston and The People a filthy public campaign ... one of the most disgraceful smear campaigns ever launched against a newspaper.’

With such strong convictions, it’s odd that The People have never bothered to sue the Friends for libel. Certainly the financial problems wouldn’t be too great. IPC’s profits at October ‘68 were up to £6,236,000. Compare this with the Friend’s failure to raise more than £150 for their first abortive libel action on behalf of Mr Mills.

But the real importance of this case is that it exposes the Press Council as a complete fake.

The Council is composed of at least 80% journalist, all dependent on the industry. All the Constitution has to say about lay representatives is that Representatives of the Public shall not exceed 20% of the total to vote. The same anachronism exists in the much-criticised Police Tribunals.

Of course, the logical solution is contained in the Constitution of the Press Council. We quote Section 16: Dissolution:

‘The Council may at any time terminate its existence if it appears to the members that the Council’s voluntary nature and independence are threatened.’

It’s obvious to us that the Council never had any ‘voluntary nature and independence’ to begin with — by the very nature of it’s Constitution.

THE ADJUDICATION

Six months passed. Despite letters and phone calls, the Friend’s elicited only one piece of information: Paul’s assistant, a Mr E Harrison, said that although he could give no information about the progress of complaints, he would say that the matter ‘had become a nightmare for Mr Paul and no-one was more anxious than Mr Paul to get it off his desk.’ On 28th July 1968, the Council’s 670 word statement was published.

Their adjudication was:

‘The Press Council is satisfied that the article in The People contained no substantial inaccuracy and the complaint that it was vicious, malicious and grossly inaccurate is rejected.’

As far as is known, The People was the only national paper to mention the adjudication. Under the heading ‘End of a Vile Campaign — The Paper that Finds Out’ on the front page of the 28 July issue, Editor Robert Edwards indulged in an orgy of self praise.

‘It was, in fact, a masterpiece of good reporting! ’Once more The People has lived up to its reputation as the paper that finds out and publishes the facts as they really are.’

Staff writer Germaine talks to Dr G, a celebrated (and over educated) international groupie.

Musicians, like other men, have always had women, but something in their way of having them was different by virtue of their being musicians, like it would differ again for airline pilots and lighthouse keepers. In the years BB (before Beatlemania) there were two kinds of musicians' birds, the musos' old ladies and the scrubbers. The rock-and-rollers picked up and put down the local goers like meals, perhaps storing a little woman at home, protected from the knowledge of her husband's promiscuity and lunatic fringes of his sexuality. The scrubbers suffered all his aggression, all his loneliness and self doubt. The Jazz musicians had a different scene. They toured less often and less spectacularly, and played to a discriminating clientele which came to listen. They were deep into their music, and so perform were their women. Marriage was not common, but monogamy was the rule. It was a hard life for the birds, because they never went out at night except to sit out the old man's sets. There wasn't much money so they worked in the daytime, and fought fatigue and loneliness sitting in a dark corner where the clubowner would not find their presence intolerable. They came to listen instead of waiting at home because musicians were not often verbal in those days of separated media, and the only way they could hear the message of love was through the music. But cool jazz was cool. The message was often cold, inner-directed, and musos often lost their birds, not often to each other. Some of them took up a pose of embitterment, and took it out on the scrubbers. Lots of them drank or pillied up. One or two kept a wife in the suburbs. And took that out on the scrubbers too.

'The first boyfriend I ever had,' said Dr G, the Daytripper, 'was a jazz drummer, the best. I was with him for a year, and I never danced with him: that was one of the things it meant. I couldn't even dance to his music, in front of him. Seems like I sat that whole year. In the end I became the hatcheck girl in the club. Then he took a long gig in another state. On his last night in the club he sang a blues just for me, about having a girl ten foot tall, and I cried myself blind in the hatcheck room. The rag merchants talked all through it and then they all clapped their hands. She knitted her brows. Then somebody told him I had been with somebody else, 2,000 miles away, and he just dropped me cold without another word. Can you imagine that?'

But the post Beatle era was dawning and the media were drawing closer to each other for the fusion which is now. Music became commercial and creative, not only notes but words, not only sound but physical onslaught, sight, movement, total environment. The jazz musician's love affair with his instrument moved out of his head and met the rocker's violent cruel sensuality at tenderness junction, and the girls sitting wiped out against cold nightclub walls in quiet clothes arose with their listening eyes and danced along opened out their beauty in the various light and sex flowed back into the scene and lapped all around them. Where all the currents intersected and flowed forward and back, there he was, the musical revolutionary-poet calling all to witness the new order and achieve the group grope, astride his thousands of volts, wending his horn while the mode of the music changed and the walls of the city fell and everybody burst out laughing. The women kept on dancing while their long skirts crept up, and their girdles dissolved, and their nipples burst through like hyacinth tips and their clothes withered away to the mere wisps and ghost of draperies to adorn and glorify, and at last the cunt lay open like a shining seapath to the sun.

So who did it happen for? Not for everybody. For the musicians it happened, and for those same girls who dragged out their lives flattened against a leaf of sound, for their sisters and their daughters. The women who really understand what the bass guitar is saying when it thumps against their skin, a velvet-hard glans of sound waves, nuzzling. To understand and face the possibilities of annihilation without flinching. To be limitless, Infinite. Bounty as boundless as the sea, and love as deep. Here's how it happened for one.

'I was very slow to turn onto pop. I turned down an invitation to a party for the Beatles. I moved from jazz through blues, skirted folk music, and ended up with Bach and Buxtehude. Monteverdi and the great madmen. Hobnobbed with guys who were called composers and wrote operas and ballets and stuff. Started to go to concerts of contemporary music and talk about it. Sang Carl Orff. The song that made the difference was I can't get no satisfaction and the original resensifiers were The Stones. I pay attention. The walls of the city began to shake.'

'It was evident that there was a pop conspiracy to blow the minds of my generation. I was interested but not involved. I only began to understand the group symbol when I met Simon Dupree and the Big Sound in a TV Studio. The place was full of smoothies and groovers being cool and calculating every move. The sounds of sucking filled the air, when these little guys blasted off, singing what was already an old number, Reservations, I remember, and his underpants showed. And he sweated a lot. And his sound blew out all the crap and BBC gumshoes and I knew I was on his side. You know what its like; all the technicians regard rockstars as freaks, the management regards them as charming, grubby mental defectives. Then they bring me and don't give a fuck. The message is clear. When I was being assessed for some change, or other in some little thing that squeezed all my boots up, I looked up and they were all looking at me... with a kind of hot innocence, and I suddenly realised that groupiedom was possible. But the stitches were still in. Just say, it occurred to me. They all went off and took a train to Aberdeen or somewhere, some gruelling bloody awful tour.

The first popstar I actually pulled was an entire accident. I was at this ball in the country (the best scene for a calculated 'hit' now I come to consider it) and I was having a dreary time because my bloke was utterly spaced out, so I made myself mildly conspicuous. (We should point out that Dr G's six feet and other freakish attributes make inconspicuousness a more significant achievement.) And sure enough in the first break the lead singer of the group turned up next to me and stayed there, which was alright except it was a nowhere group who were not getting it together and I didn't dig him. I started to kind of edge away and I walked into the lead singer of the star group and we went into this crazy improvised routine, as if we'd known each other for years. When it's right that's show it is. You recognise each other, and you play in tune. Because you meet that way there are no hang-ups, no ploys, well, no ways of exploiting each other. If you fuck, you do it with the carnal innocence of children or cats or something. When you've watched a man calling his call and you've heard it and know what it means, there are no limits; the night you spend together is limitless too... you might go off for a few days to a few places, but it's immaterial if you're still together... sounds like a poor line in cheap mysticism, but that's how it can be. Usually you separate quite soon, because there are things to do, more things to have and do, and maybe it happens again a few times, maybe months apart. It's a bit like a jam session I suppose. Or a supergroup. Maybe he's married or got an old lady: that's like his regular scene. He knows he can blow good things when he's with you, sometimes, things he can only blow with you, so you get together. That's how I like it. Monogamy is death for me.

She's laughing but she means it. She explains that she's very promiscuous but out of the hundreds of guys that she's made, relatively few are popstars, but most of the popstars are names to conjure with.

'I guess I'm a starfucker really. You know it's a name I dig, because all the men who get inside me are stars. Even if they're plumbers, they're star plumbers. Another thing I dig is bailing the greats before the rest of the world knows about them, before they get the hype. Because I have to follow my judgement, not the charts, you dig? Now take Magic Terry, he's a star which your telescope hasn't picked up yet? We met at a party in New York, and he said he wanted to come and read poetry at my apartment. I believed him, although it seemed unlikely and he came and did this amazing thing, this enormous poetry, which he's going to do soon (if he doesn't die or something) with the best hard rock backing money and his judgement can get, and that is the best. When it happens it will all happen to me too, whether I'm there or not. The great thing about starfucking is that every time you play a record, or just dig his thing again, it's all there, like he was there.'

I spy on her by looking through the records scattered round the turntable: they are the names I expect, with a few notable exceptions. I had seen her sharing Jim Morrison's spotlight at the Doors concert so I asked why there were none of their records there.

'I suppose I went there to get some Jim Morrison. I never know until I experience the thing properly whether it's a good thing or not. Jim Morrison was a terrible bring down. I mean, he was there and coming on like a fucking sex kitten, pouting and wiggling and slipping out of his clothes. He thought he was singing to teeny-boppers and kept throwing them the drumsticks and stuff and everyone froze with embarrassment. The vibes were so bad that he started to have trouble getting it together. He went upstage and tried to bring himself on jigging the maracas up and down with his elbow down here so he'd have a stand to show the customers, and then he goes leaping down to show it to everyone and it's gone.'

'Most commercial groups are a terrible bringdown: it must be like fucking a whore, you know. You watch them standing there slapping their instruments with these terrible fixed expressions. Can you imagine sex with Andy Fairweather-Low or that podgy guy from the Amen Corner or is it the other one? Jesus, I never know which is which. That night the Doors communicated their impotence to all of us, and we sneaked home furtively, separately, ashamed of liking that LP so long ago. What a disgusting hype they are.'

Most groups are hypes sure. That ought to be irrelevant. Like you and I both publish to earn a bottle of wine, you write The Wanker's Manual and I write Reality Sandwiches. But when a group is nothing but a hype, as I believe the Doors are, when they make love and revolution commodities, assassination is called for. Mind you, there are other kinds of motives for starfucking. Maybe if someone turned Jim Morrison on properly the Doors would open. But I'm really not a groupie-reformer, for God's sake.'

'But do you know I find Englebert very horny-making. He's so evil you know, getting all those lonely housewives to cream their jeans, with his tight highfronted shiny mohair trousers with just a touch of rubber hose. So fucking evil'

She's still laughing, and I start her off on a different tack and she stops.

'I don't know. I mean everybody uses the sacrament Acid, most people some of the time. I only ever once went with anyone on horse, and I remember it as absolutely magical. I nearly turned on myself. He was as strong as a hawk, as light as a feather. His breath was a sweet as a child and his skin was hot and smelled absolutely magical. I nearly turned on myself. He was

She is laughing again, but I am glad when the phone rings, and I put on a record while she talks.

What a bring-down...

When she comes back... I ask my last question. I phrase it awkwardly and the Doctor squeezes her fleecy hair up in her hands and laughs again.

'It's not a matter of minding balling the whole group. They're not like the ton-up guys who'd hold a girl down while they all fucked her: that's the fascist sort of homosexual kick, like where the leader fucks the girl in the glare of their headlights and they all jack off and stuff. I'd never be likely to wind up in that situation. But I'd love to be one of a group in a loving sexual situation. I just don't know very many groups who can get it together. The Airplane seem to love and listen to each other a lot, but Rolling Stone tells me they get uptight about birds. Now RS is not always right anymore than a penis is called a Hampton Wick, but... I haven't often come across groups that were so together that they could make that scene. Probably the MC5 are near it. I had to go to sleep in their hotel after Elektra had had to ring me up to get Rob Tyner to a conference, and they slept two to a room with the doors open and everyone walked through. I found out I really really liked being able to hear other people balling very close to me while I was, and I was very pleased; you see, the group fuck is the highest ritual expression of our faith, but it must happen as a sort of special grace. Contrived it could be really terrible, like a dirty weekend with the Monlees!

'When you asked me that question, you made like you thought that it was a kinky sort of thing, well it isn't you see, because kinkiness...it's the great British disease. Kinkiness comes from low energy. It's the substitution of lechery for love. You know, it would be desirous so you turn yourself on with cute variants like rubber mackintoshes and nuns' habits... Lots of popstars run a sort of playbook scene where they lie about, being the rich tycoons, having skilled whores go to work on them, sort of refining sensations like learning about caviare. Look at the image Tom Jones puts out on his TV show, a sort of fat noseless Hugh Hefner, real consumer sex in selfseal plastic wrap. But the groups I dig, and who are likely to dig me, are high energy, high voltage tenderness! There are no taboos, you can do anything anywhere, from excess to excess. Rolling Stone speak true when he say The Happy Nation sucks. Frank Zappa's an odd case though: I fancy him like mad. Have you seen his portrait on his American sleeve of Ruben and the Jets. Here they made it too little, but the big photo reveals that Frank Zappa is a Grade-A-High-School-Prom-Heart-Throb!

I dig everything he does, except when he goes into his paranoid why - am I - explaining - you don't - care - or - understand routine, but I'd think twice about balling him because Ed Sanders told me that he has the same perversion as Tyrone Power on Hollywood Babylon and somebody else told me that that means he's a shit fancier! How do you get that together for Godsake? I don't really believe it. It's probably meant to frighten off all but the brave and resourceful. Still, maybe I'm not that brave and resourceful. Nevertheless, because I really respond to his vibes, I want him, shit or no shit, because that's how it is if your body and soul and mind are hooked up. I'd fuck Shakespeare, except that he specially asked that his bones not be disturbed.'

She jumps up to get ready to go eat at the Macrobiotic (because she likes it!) and rattles on while she fluffs out her hair, about the cafe-au-lait groupies of New York, brittle and loveless, but beautiful and Would we lie?

Apple thinks Jackie Lomax has a lovely album called "Is This What You Want?"
Would we lie if we said, yes, it is what you want?
YOU MIGHT THINK IT'S A LOAD OF OLD COMMAN, BUT THAT'S YOUR HANGUP

Come to think of it, psychedelics, macrobiotics and just plain idiotics have bowled over an awful lot of musicians these past few years. You know the sort of thing. 'Man, that was just the grooviest...'

"I don't think it's a load of old command, but that's your hangup," territory - where advanced pop, jazz and theory everyone, somewhere, and Crudely boils down to a kind of chance, or random, theory finally gone to a lot of musicians these past few years, always mixing up the words and melody of his lass and next songs with the one he's supposed to be into. And then falls into the orchestra pit.

The lucky ones, to their claim goes, and mine, wake up forever. A world in a grain of sound is their first, fabulous discovery. From that moment on, he might lead anywhere or nowhere but they'll seem new steps and they'll seem revolutionary steps and they might be. Melody, harmony, rhythm die as we've known them to be reborn, perhaps. Those aged, exhausted Imperturbatives, the G7 to C, 4 x 4 = 12 - The Blues syndrome can never again go, and mine, wake up forever. A world in a grain of sound is their first, fabulous discovery.

Aleatory (sometimes called 'chance', or random), theory finally and crudelybole down to a kind of anything goes as long as it works for someone, somewhere. It's criteria, to say the least, is vague. To bore the pants off an audience is often considered desirable. Inner tension is perhaps the universally favoured expression of praise. Unpredictable factors like the crossing of a chair, three rows from the back of a concert hall can become a crucial ingredient of the performance, equal in musical status to a pre-planned, notated instrumental sequence.

Way back when flower's and love and doing your own thing and smiling at the fuzz were all in bloom I took part in what was probably the first attempt here to put aleatory principles into practice in a pop context. My participation was, I believe, unique. The result was that best-forgotten first LP by Hamish and the Colored Coat. I doubt, however, if the Pye Recording Studio people will ever forget it. Every manner of banging, plucking, stroking and blown sound producing device was put at our disposal. There was an instruction only - from the rather excited sessions producer, 'Blow', he would say, frantically dashing from one well-intentioned group to another. 'Blow, baby, blow. For the next three hours, with increasing timidity, possibly 100 people banged, plucked, stroked and blew and looked as if they were on the worst trip of their lives.

An American friend of mine used to play the same jazzy trip. You'd be settling into a nice scene at her place when suddenly without warning she'd produce an equally bewildering array of instruments and utterly obliterate your high by saying to her, 'New York kids: Martha Graham modulated dance instructress voice: 'Come on, everyone can be an artist. Technique is the refuge of the insecure. Let's just forget all about our self-conscious little ego and create beautiful, beautiful sound.

Just as the dancers go on and on about how the traditional concepts of their art are mere deformations of spontaneity so the new musicians talk of how they're going to be the last and next songs with the one they're supposed to be into. And then falls into the orchestra pit.

The lucky ones, to their claim goes, and mine, wake up forever. A world in a grain of sound is their first, fabulous discovery.

There's lots of talk too about John Cage, that most discussed and least listened to, to me at least, is vaguely. To bore the pants off an audience is often considered desirable. This album makes you feel good. It makes you feel good to hear Bonham and Jones working together, creating those deep, surging, underruins of rhythm as Page again and again noisily the more vulnerable areas of his Telecaster. Good to listen to Plant with his ugly, angry vocals, bellowing to his woman that he's leaving her -- fight after the next lunch. Good to dig completely spontaneous but so, so beautifully controlled breaks in How Many More Times, or Jones running smoke on his Hammond keyboard in Willie Dixon's You Shook Me and to sway, entranced with Page's droning, mantra-like bow guitar in Dazed & Confused.

It makes you feel good because it is good; and in places much more than that.

Of course, as a result of this album we'll lose the group to the States, and almost certainly within the month the M M letters page will headline - 'Is Page BETTER Than God?!!' - and then the BBC will begin negotiations on a feature film ... but there's more to it than that. There is a phrase nobody uses anymore, (not since we de-fracktured our hair, handed back granny her beads quietly disposing of knaffans and joss sticks to jumble collectors). That phrase exactly sums up Led Zeppelin's debut album. Remember Good Vibrations? Felix Dennis Sometimes, somewhere they have been together in a recording studio to try and put something between the pretty coloured Rhinoceros. The results of their efforts don't take long to hear. The first time I played it I had to take it off again it was so bad. But the record came from Elektra, so I tried again later.

After the sounds become familiar it's not so bad and occasionally a little bit of it neatly comes together, but then it is possible to become accustomed to things that are really quite unpleasant. Usually unpleasant things are avoided. In this case it's easy. I still have my copy. One of these days somebody will get the hot eye for the pretty cover and take it away. That's how it goes. Bryan Willis.

LED ZEPPELIN Led Zeppelin, Atlantic 58817)

Very occasionally a long-playing record is released that defies immediate classification or description, simply because it's so obviously a turning point in rock music that only time proves capable of shifting it into eventual perspective. (Dylan's Bringing It All Back Home, The Byrds Younger Than Yesterday, Disraeli Gears, Hendrix's Are You Experienced?) This Led Zeppelin album is like that.

Before joining the now sadly defunct Yardbirds Jim Page was acknowledged as one of the best session musicians on either side of the Atlantic. Here it's clear why. Few rock musicians in the world could hope to parallel the degree of technical assurance and guitar emotion he displays throughout these nine tracks. Exactly eighty-four seconds after the first cut, side one, Page does things with the stick, powerful without deteriorating into frenzied, feverish thrashing.

John Paul Jones plays bass and organ for Led Zeppelin. It's enough to say that of both instruments he is an experienced, resourceful master. This album makes you feel good. It makes you feel good to hear a band with so much to say and the conspicuous ability to say it as they feel it; to translate what's in their heads to music. It makes you feel good to hear Bonham and Jones working together, creating those deep, surging, underruins of rhythm as Page again and again noisily the more vulnerable areas of his Telecaster. Good to listen to Plant with his ugly, angry vocals, bellowing to his woman that he's leaving her -- fight after the next lunch. 'PROJECTIONS'. The Concert Ensemble, featuring, John Handy, Michael White, Mike Nock, Bruce Gale, Larry Hancock, CBS. Since first hearing John Handy at Monterey, I have very much enjoyed hearing and selling all his albums. So far CBS have released four of them: Monterey, 2nd Album, New View, and Projections.

In 1965 Handy recorded Spanish Lady and If Only We Know. These were live recordings, and on this occasion the quintet consisted of Handy, also; Mike White, violin; Don Thompson, piano and bass; Terry Hahn on guitar, and Terry Clark on drums. On this occasion several thousand people gave Handy a standing ovation.

The second LP, Mr Handly, gives us five very different themes to work on. Dancy, Dancy is a simple little tune, in the Bossanova beat, with some really nice drumming by Perry Clarke, Sonne, X, on the other hand is more serious, and is in 5/4 time, while Blues For A High Strung Guitar is really beautiful, featuring Jerry Hutchison on guitar, New View was recorded in 1967, and the line-up is completely changed. This time Mike White is not featured at all. Instead Bobby Hutchison, courtesy of Blue Note Records, plays vibraphone. This is not such an exciting sound, rather it is a sad sound, and was recorded at The Village Gate in New York, some three weeks before the death of John Coltrane. In fact, Handy dedicates a track to that memory. This is more serious Handy, and requires a much more concentrated attention. Projection is the latest release, and is very much more like the first album, Mike Van is back with Handy, and the tracks all have a much lighter, air about them.

RHINOCEROS. Elektra EKS 74030.

A decorated Rhinoceros with sort of multi-coloured scales, strung with shells and beads. Very pretty.

Inside seven cats looking serious or Western Movie Style mean. They have hats, rings, hair on their faces and scarves around their necks. They come from the Electric Flag, The Iron Butterfly, The Buffalo Springfield. The Mothers of Invention and there is a cat from some music school.

Sometime, somewhere they have been together in a recording studio to try and put something between the pretty coloured Rhinoceros. The results of their efforts don't take long to hear. The first time I played it I had to take it off again it was so bad. But the record came from Elektra, so I tried again later.

After the sounds become familiar it's not so bad and occasionally a little bit of it neatly comes together, but then it is possible to become accustomed to things that are really quite unpleasant. Usually unpleasant things are avoided. In this case it's easy. I still have my copy. One of these days somebody will get the hot eye for the pretty cover and take it away. That's how it goes. The track Projections itself is in waltz time, composed by pianist Mike Knock, featuring some excellent double stops and exchanges between Handy and White. I think the track that reminds me most of Monterey is Senora Nancye because the opening is again unaccompanied sax and the quartet come in with the same feeling. The album lasts forty-two minutes, and is well worth the 37/6d that I paid for it. If you can afford it, try and make up the set as it is always possible that CBS may decide to delete the earlier recordings.

ROOTS, The Everly Brothers. Warner Bros. Seven Arts Records WS1752

Roots by the old Everly Brothers is a dandy bucketful of tunes that'll bring that renegade Cowboy Spirit back home. The album sleeve notes explain that the album is an attempt by the brothers to trace their roots or something like that and if sure does, sort of. They've sprinkled the album with some very short bits of tape done by themselves along with Mom and Dad Everly, the whole family pickin' pluckin' and singin' away on their old radio show somewhere.

The third cut deserving a special mention might well be the high spot of the album. It's the Merle Haggard composition, Sing Me Back Home. The arrangement on this is so tight (!) that the consequent tension provides some kind of weird dimension that really makes this tune bite! Sing Me Back Home is the key to Roots and to Country & Western and it fits like a finger. On the back of the key it says: You can do what you may to a man but you can't tear the music from him, it was around long before he got there. 'Sing me back home, before I die...'

YOU CAN'T BEAT PEOPLE UP & HAVE THEM SAY I LOVE YOU
Murray Roman Track 613 007

America never had music hall as such. It had saloons in frontier towns, and later it had silent films, prohibition and speakeasies. None of these are really ideal environments for the stand-up comic, the patter merchant who flourished on the British stage, and wasn't until the advent of an electronic, tv-orientated age that the USA really got into the swing of this kind of humour. Once it did, however, it produced some notable talents: Stan Freeberg, Shelley Berman and Bob Newhart among them, Murray Roman works in this tradition but uses the West Coast freakout idiom. Whether he's an entirely natural product of his time is arguable (he has groovy friends like Tom Smothers who count against him) but outside the bounds of this review, if he has cut his clothes to suit the style of the day then he's done it so well that none of the seams show. The patter is very neat. One of the faults of this album (it's as riddled as gruyere cheese) is that, if anything, the patter is too neat, Roman obviously believes a comic can get by on idiom alone, an idea so daring it hasn't been attempted since George Formby. Fuck content, Roman seems to be saying, a thing, anything, has only to sound funny to get you laughing.

Even the relatively lucid, straight tracks bow to this abnegation of content: canned phoney 'soul' music clatters in the background, the organ gets out of control, the intercut at random to destroy any idea of sequence or cohesion; the traditional devices of humour, the juxtapositions, the interplay of tensions that provokes laughter, are spread pretty thin; at all times the style's the thing. All very well, but can you really get laughs by declaiming sotto voce and with echo: 'Smoke your draft card'? Well maybe, but not by paying the same kind of shallow lip service to psychedelic effect and serious modern preoccupations (such as drugs and race riots) for two entire sides of an LP. One can't blame Murray Roman for trying, I suppose, but having tried he should have had the grace to acknowledge the experiment as a failure. I think it's Shelley Berman in disguise.

- Deram. Mono DML 1033, Stereo SML 1033

When your organ gets out of control, pop-pickers, beware. No other instrument can compare with it for volume, variety or sustaining power. Equally no other instrument in the history of music has attracted so many megalomaniacs, pedants and bores. Only an organist (Al Kooper of Dylan backings and Super-Session fame) could bring out an album called "I Stand Alone". Probably the most sinister thing about the Right Hon. Edward Heath is not his tendency to keep us with the Powells but the fact that he's an accomplished player and a fully paid-up member of the Royal Society of Organists. So watch that organ.

Don Gallucci is the somewhat overwhelming organist with this new group from California. Listening to Touch you get the feeling that he's very much the boss, that he's academically clever (probably a Juilliard graduate or something) and that if only he'd work more at his piano he might end up a considerable jazz soloist. Some of the nicest things here take place when he shifts from key-board pipes to key-board strings. Despite blurbs claims of "unique individuality" however, the other four members of "Touch" don't amount to much except as glorified organ stops for Maestro Gallucci to pull and shove. Nevertheless they are kept extremely busy. Touch is very tight, together and troubling. Apart from easy-going tracks like We Feel Fine, The Spiritual Death of Howard Green and Miss Teach the music has the character of a ritual funeral wake, all spooky organ riffs and stately drum beats. On the credit side however I've not heard a record since "The United States of America" which so boldly and effectively tackles the problems of avantgarde pop.

There may not be much joy but there's musical adventure galore. Eschewing the blues altogether and indifferent to the devices of straight pop "Touch" attempts a synthesis of post Sergeant Pepper esoterics twentieth century classical music and jazz with just a dash of electronics and musique concrete. Heavy uncommercial stuff, heavily arranged and multi-multi-multi-tracked, pretentious certainly but not unattractively so.

The lyrics are dreadful (Wake up and feel it in the air/It's a time of hope for man/Jesus was right/Sensitivity Reigns/But yet the fighting and the hatred goes on and on and on) but the organisation and distribution of the vocal parts is often brilliant and original. Seldom have voices been used with such austere theatrical style in a pop context. On second thoughts though it could also be said that seldom have voices (the same is true of the lead guitar) sounded so much like they came from the organ. Drat that organ.

One day last year the intercom buzzed in a Chelsea studio: "Postman here, special delivery"...up the stairs came Pilcher and the boys puffing and panting and screaming "where's Eric Clapton, where's Eric Clapton?" Out, luckily, so the co-tenant was bagged instead. For God's sake, someone; give Pilcher a lead guitar and build a group around him. Sergeant Pilcher and the Great Alf Conspiracy. It might catch on. art is creation of beautiful space, to live in, artists create the beautiful space, and artists, if living, live in it. A town could be paradise, but the thing is, in this age of superstition, sanity. Nobody seems to think about pleasure in a city. A city is designed seemingly to make people dirty, rushed, harassed and preoccupied with the amount of money owned and acquired. There is no logical reason why a city should not be a garden of joy. But it's down to thoughts— a city is built the colour of the mood that built it and uses it. —Inc. Incredibles.
THE ONLY LIVING DYLANOLOGIST

Recently The East Village Other has been featuring articles by A.J. Weberman, in which the self-styled 'Dylanologist' dissects at length the songs of Bob Dylan and of others (such as Hey Jude) which he feels he can relate in some way to Dylan. The articles have produced, not surprisingly, some outraged letters from EVO readers, containing comments ranging from outright abuse ('A.J. Weberman is an ass-hole') to the restrained irony of 'soon he will be finding a meaning in such obvious nonsense poetry as Mother Goose'. Weberman is shortly to publish a book about his findings in connection with Dylan. Dylan's new LP is due out sometime in April. The 'definite last word' on John Wesley Harding which follows, provides another, a la 'warning to those who walk at high cost, to load a simple song with significance and meaning. The text is taken from an interview with Weberman by Gordon Friesen, contributing editor of Broadside Magazine, which appeared originally in Graffiti.

G: How about JOHN WESLEY HARDING? How does it stack up to his other work?

Alan: First of all, in this album Dylan has changed his style of poetry. In the other recent LP's he used surrealistic, 3-dimensional, multi-layered imagery in order to get across what he wanted to say. Now in JOHN WESLEY HARDING we have what are apparently meaningful songs on one level. But on this level the meaning is kind of trivial - 'John Wesley Harding was a friend to the poor' and all that crap. It's enough for many people; few people look for irony anymore since they tend to take Dylan quite literally; and the stories on JOHN WESLEY HARDING make sense on this level, to some degree. They make more sense than the material on most of Dylan's previous albums, especially Bringing It All Back Home and Blonde on Blonde. You know that the cat isn't going to write this simple kind of poetry. Everything is going to have an ironic meaning. As Dylan says, 'Don't under estimate me and I won't under estimate you.' This album is full of irony even though you might not be able to find it at first glance. I happen to believe that the whole first side is autobiography, Dylan talking about his career including the time he had the motorcycle accident. 'John Wesley Harding was a friend to the poor, he travelled with a gun in every hand'. Here we apparently have the Robin Hood superman outlaw. 'All along this countryside he opened many a door'. He took off a lot of people, but he never known to hurt an honest man. He only ripped off the dishonest rich. But when I hear it, it's a song about the old Dylan, i.e. the Dylan of the TIMES THEY ARE A-CHANGING days, who was 'a friend to the poor', that is, a proletarian songwriter who wrote songs about the poor. 'Hollis Brown', 'Hattie Carroll', 'Only a Pawn in Their Game', and so on. So he was a leftist songwriter, a leftist poet, he travelled with a gun in every hand - gun is guitar in this context because Dylan says 'in every hand' you generally play a guitar with both hands (unless you're Jimi Hendrix, that is). Woody used a similar metaphor when he wrote on his guitar case: 'This machine kills fascists'. And here's something funny: Teen Star Time Magazine said April 1, 1966, 'Bob Dylan, who sings his own compositions, wears blue jeans and has little to do with barbers, and is armed with a guitar... (my emphasis). So, that's weird. The whole melody and arrangement of this poem is extremely Guthriescue... all along this countryside', and why 'all along'? Every word that Dylan uses has ironic meaning. 'All along the watchtower/Princes kept the view'; why 'all along'? If anyone has any ideas on this write to me in care of Broadside, 215 W 98St, NYC 10025. 'This countryside is the USA where he opened many a door'. 'Opened the door' is a phrase used by some commercial trade publications to describe Dylan's effect on the music business around the time of 'Blowing in the Wind'. For instance CASHBOX Magazine on Oct 5 1963, said: 'If the Kingston Trio opened the door of the folk boom, then Bob Dylan has opened the door much further with Blowin' in the Wind. Others with Dylan's perspective can now get a chance to be heard and display their musical wares. So whether pro or con Bob Dylan, one cannot deny that he is a major force to be watched and reckoned with. So Dylan borrows this phrase from the commercial pop music publications. But he was never known to hurt an honest man - the singers whom Dylan replaced were dishonest in the sense that they didn't sing the truth, what was happening to them or going on in their minds; they sang almost exclusively about true love and that sort of bullshit often entirely divorced from reality. It was down in Chaney County --- down south in Mississippi where Chaney, Goodman and Schwerner were slaughtered.' A time they talk about --- they don't talk about it in the movie Don't Look Back, where Dylan is shown in Greenwood Mississippi with Seeger and Bikel singing to a black audience. 'With his lady by his side' at first I thought this line referred to Joan Baez, because in Oxford Town Dylan says, 'Me, my gal, and my gal's son, we got met with a teargas bomb'. I kind of erased the information that Joan has no son and wasn't with him in Greenwood. But then I remembered that 'Lad' was Dylan's symbol for the oligarchy in some of his previous poems and when you reminded me that the Feds were behind the Civil Rights voter registration I realised he may have meant: 'With the Federal Government on his (political) side'. He took a stand—a microphone and a stand on the issues—. And soon the situation there was all but straightened out', he went down south to protest the murders and brutality going on (Dylan was very sincere—, 'Don’t Look Back', if you look at his eyes while he sings 'Only a Pawn in Their Game' you will see tears in them). But the Civil Rights linked murders went on the same as before—, in fact, it was after he went to Mississippi that Chaney, Goodman, Schwerner, Viola Liuzzo and others were killed. And so Bob Dylan, in combination with our great Federal Government—, didn’t really help the situation at all.

'For he was always known to lend a helping hand'—Dylan attributed this lack of success to the fact that the hand fate dealt him wasn’t high enough to straighten out his own problems, let alone those of the black people, and when combined with the hand of the Federal Government was a stoned loser. 'All across the telegraph'—make those capital 'T's'. The Telegraph, a prototypical American newspaper—, his name it did resound—, Dylan received a lot of publicity in the press media. 'But no charge held against him could they prove'. The press slandered him—, many of the articles written about Dylan were derogatory. For example, Time Magazine had one entitled 'Not quite a Genius Genius And Newswatch printed an article accusing Dylan of getting 'Blowin' in the Wind' from a New Jersey High School student named Lorre Wyatt.

'As I Went Out One Morning' has to do, I think, about what happened when Dylan got the Thomas Paine Award from the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee. 'I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine' deals with Dylan the poetic political activist pretty much as he was during the Bringing It All Back Home Days. This is a good example of what happens to listeners if not set to get into Dylan. It sounds like some semi-religious mystic poetry sufficient unto itself. But if you are hip to where Dylan's head is at, then you'll find that what appears simple is actually a lot of irony with hidden meaning. 'All along the Watchtower'—at first I thought this was about Dylan's friend Ginsberg—, 'Two riders', 'writers' were approaching and the wind—, Dylan's most promising symbol, the wind—, began to howl—, Ginsberg's autobiographical poem. I want to make a confession. I even went and asked Ginsberg and he said, 'No, it never took place. It never happened'. So I decided that Dylan is talking about when he became electrified, though I'm still not sure—, 'the wind began to howl'. Like 'the ghost of electricity howls in the bones of her face'. It follows, because he then goes ahead and tells about his experience as a rock singer in the 'Ballad of Frankie Lee and Judas Priest'. 'Which is very funny—an interesting riff—, 'Frankie Lee'—Frankie Lane, Frankie Lyman—it's Dylan the rock and roll singer. Dylan, when he was making records like 'Positively 4th Street', 'Like a Rolling Stone—, 'Please Crawl out of Your Window'. And Judas Priest is none other than his manager, Al Grossman. It could be any kind of commercial character but it seems to be Grossman. The last cut on the first side 'A Drifter's Escape' is Dylan telling about his motorcycle accident. The whole side shows that Dylan is getting to be more autobiographical and more concerned with what is going on in his head.

G: You haven’t had time to get into the second side?

A. Not really. I’ve only been playing the record five times a day now for seven months. But I have some ideas. 'Dear Landlord' is I think, addressed to a Dylan critic or interpreter. 'I am a Lonesome Hobo' is a very personal song. 'I pity the Poor Immigrant' is, I think, about Viet Nam. 'The Wicked Messenger'—this song is a very short history of Dylan's career from a radical standpoint. 'There was a wicked messenger, from Eli he did come—, Dylan is the wicked messenger, and Eli is the Old Testament from which he draws so much of his symbolism. 'Down Along the Cove' is another very personal song. And 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight' I feel, although I'm not sure, is Dylan saying that he is going to stop protesting. What makes me think that is laying a 'message' on us it’s its position at the end of the LP. Dylan often saves the last cut on an album to tell us what he's going to do on the next one. He did it with 'Restless Farewell', announcing he was going to change; he did it in 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands', where he wasn’t sure he should continue being a recording artist. So I felt that in 'Baby To-night' Dylan is giving us a hint of what his next album is going to be like. It's going to be very simple. Perhaps he is not really going to stop protesting, just seem to stop. The irony will still be there, only it will be in a different form of poetry. I'm beginning to wonder if Dylan's not running out of autobiographical things to say—, he’s said it all—, given his ideas about politics, leftists, rightists, man's condition, universities, the mass media, war, religion, philosophy, science, idealism, everything. A whole lifetime of ideas—he's really offered what amounts to complete systematised ideology, a complete world view. But then, Dylan has a way of presenting the same ideas in new forms. If you want to understand JOHN WESLEY HARDING you have to understand all of Dylan. You have to take his first record BOB DYLAN, play the two original cuts on it, then go on and listen to every record, albums and singles Dylan has ever released, in chronological order. And to really understand Dylan you have to be a revolutionary—you have to have an extreme dislike for our present society and a strong desire to overthrow it.

G: Alan, how does your system of interpreting Dylan work? It sounds quite complicated.

Alan: First, you've got to get thoroughly acquainted with Dylanology. That means, among other things, you have got to realise that everything the cat says is packed with irony. If you can't find the irony that doesn't say it isn't there; it means only that you can't ends to use it pretty consistently. Take the symbol 'lady' which came up before. Remember 'With his lady by his side/He took a stand'? The reason I said it meant oligarchy in that context was because I had looked at Dylan's use of the word in several other contexts. You see, my brain is this computer, programmed with Dylan's poetry, so when I hear the word 'lady', I think of 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands'. In the empty lot where the ladies play blindman's bluff with the key chain, and 'And the ladies treat me kindly and furnish me with tape'. And 'As lady and I look out to-night from Desolation Row,' When I substitute the word 'oligarchy' for 'lady' in these lines, I get a coherent interpretation. Dig it, Gordon? In the empty lot America - where the ladies - the oligarchy - 'play blindman's bluff with the key chain' - plays meaningless games with the nation's wealth. 'And the all night girls' - the poor - 'whisper of escapades' - are forced into an existence where sex becomes another form of escape - 'out on the D-Train.' 'Train' is a Guthrie symbol which Bob uses. Remember, 'This train don't carry no gamblers, this train'? I think Woody meant this 'life', the life cycle. Well, Dylan means the same thing. But 'D' is Death, so the D-Train becomes the Death Train, and this is a very apt metaphor since the D-Train used to go through the Lower East Side, Bedford-Stuyvesant and Harlem, where death is prevalent all around. Hey, I better cool myself before I run down my whole book.

Of his new LP Dylan himself has had this to say: 'I can't remember too much about how I wrote the new songs. It depends on where I am, what the weather is like and who is around at the time. The music is a little of everything. You'll know what it is when you hear it... The new songs are easy to sing and there aren't too many words' entertaining, and the softer girls who still hunt among the minstrels the familiar lineaments of a husband and cry by silent telephones in lofts along the Bowery, of the necessity of being into your own thing, of getting back into your body so if you understand and admire an artist your nipples erect when you read a line of him or hear a bar of his music (like berries under the brown gauze of her long dress whipped with old lace) so Norman Mailer's penis blossoms in her head, stopping suddenly to swoop and kiss me on the mouth with her hand cupping my breast as naturally as a nest a bird, a kiss full of promise for a day when we shall come to life among the flowers of Beulah, 'rejoicing in unity In the Four Senses, in the Outline, the Circumference and Form, for ever in the Forgiveness of Sins which is Self Annihilation', and I notice that she has changed the record.

I'm so glad, I'm so glad, I'm glad, I'm glad, I'm glad.
You can't beat people up and have them say I LOVE YOU

Once in a while, somebody does something that is out of the mainstream, and this album is one of those things. It's an example of a unique, creative effort by an individual. Not to make a comparison, but... it's like Catcher in the Rye, Lenny Bruce, Sergeant Pepper and King Kong... all those other things that knock me out.

I've known Murray Roman for a long time... he blew my mind occasionally. He had some groovy ideas, but with this album, he suddenly just stepped out and became more than a comedian... He became an innovator of a new style of comedy, and this record will become a classic. These are some of the reasons why I think so...

(1) The concept of combining the music of today with comedic social comment, results in an emotional impact that transcends either music or comedy individually. One serves the other to make a total marriage.

(2) He did it in spite of the fact that all the major labels said: "I think it's great, but I don't think we'll be able to distribute it. Some people will be offended."

(3) Most of all, I think it will become a classic, because it's done well... it's beautiful and awkwardly naked... it's meaningful... it's funny.

Murray is my friend, and I am proud to be associated with him and what he's done here. I think it's wild, and I'm sure you will want to play it for a lot of your friends, as I have.
THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF SEXUAL BEHAVIOR

Edited by Albert Ellis, PH. D., and Albert Abarbanel, PH. D.

2 volumes—over 1,000,000 words. More than 100 learned contributors from 27 countries.

The most surprising thing about this work is that responsible adult readers have had to wait so long for it. And yet a free access to all varieties of sexual knowledge is essential to anyone who would understand science, literature—or human life.

In THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF SEXUAL BEHAVIOR this knowledge has been gathered in one set of books for the first time in Britain.

Beginning with prehistoric sex idols, you'll find what you may be seeking about the hetairae and the Venus Callipyge of antiquity... sexual mores from polyandry to call girls... Hermaphroditism... quaint customs such as "tinkling stones" and "witch prickings"... the Early American customs of bundling and smock marriages... strange apparel from chastity belts to codpieces... right on up to such contemporary figures as "Christine" and the cult of James Dean.

The Encyclopedia holds no editorial prejudice. You'll find information about lesbianism, the erogenous zones in women's fashions, artificial insemination, the erotic terminology of food, etc.—information of the greatest value to all who want to understand the real and the "hidden" culture of our day.
