1984 SUMMER SESSION A WINNER!

Over 600 participants enrolled in credit and non-credit subjects as part of the 1984 Summer Session. The session, the second conducted by the University, has been an outstanding success.

The majority of participants were students already enrolled at the University who took the opportunity to complete additional subjects towards their degrees. Indeed, some students were able to complete requirements for their degrees during the session and will now be able to graduate at the forthcoming Graduation Ceremonies.

Fifty five of the enrolments in the Credit Subjects were from people who had not previously enrolled at the University.

The Summer Session is obviously fulfilling its major aims, namely:

- to provide students already enrolled at the University with the opportunity to undertake extra subjects towards their degrees;
- to open the campus to the community and to give people who may not otherwise do so the opportunity to undertake University level and other subjects.

Enquiries were being received for the Summer Session well before the session was advertised indicating the acceptance of the session within the student population as well as in the community outside.

Letters

Sir,

The Biology Department runs a 200-level subject entitled "Evolution and Ecology of Man". Recently the two staff members responsible for this subject proposed that the name be changed to "Human Evolution and Ecology" in order to remove what might be seen as a sexist bias in the title. I was not willing to approve the change for reasons set out below. The issue was discussed at some length by our academic staff and it turned out that we were equally divided on the question. At first sight this might seem a trivial matter for departmental discussion but the ramifications of both the proposal and the decision not to implement it are extensive. I consider that the matter needs airing within the University and for that reason I bring it to your attention.

The argument for the change of title took the following line. The word "man" can be ambiguous; in some contexts it can have sexist implications that might give offence and help perpetuate discrimination against women. That could possibly be true of "Evolution and Ecology of Man" so why not change the title to one that adequately describes the course but does not give offence? The proponents of this point of view were essentially concerned that the vocabulary derived from the word "man" is frequently given a third use that is less specific. Thus, "the user has not thought much about what they really intended to say. I am not going to do that either.

Our language would be none the worse for the abandonment of this third use of "man" but it would be seriously impoverished by the loss of either of the other two. Would anthropologists, for example, really be expected to talk about "Neanderthal person"? They would probably prefer to delete him from the records and pretend he never existed. "Man" is also used as a verb, for much of the confusion. "Man" is also used as a verb, of course, but it could be unwise to attack that. I em... the user has not thought much about what they really intended to say. I am not going to do that either.

One does not have to be either a psychologist or a political scientist to recognize that one of the major problems of human relations over the whole spectrum from individuals to nations is the misunderstanding and intramusculine communication, an inherent part of which stems from uncertainties in the use of language. The antidiscrimination lobby has done a service by bringing to general attention many of the inadequacies and ambiguities in English and reminding us of the effects, sometime subtle, sometime blunt, that these can have on our social attitudes. If, in turn, this reminder leads to both a lessening of discrimination and more thoughtful and precise channels of communication, then much will have been gained. If, on the other hand, the result is a dismemberment and distortion of English, then we will all lose something and I doubt very much if anyone will benefit.

If these uses are clearly understood, there can be no serious challenge to the first two. Both the species and its male demonstrably exist and must be called something. I doubt if even the most ardent feminist would disagree with that. A major problem in attempting to deny the generic use of "man" is that it is the only common noun in English for H. sapiens sapiens. In a strict sense, that is also true for its use as "male".

A change in the title of "Evolution and Ecology of Man" for the reasons given, therefore, would have amounted to a declaration that this Biology Department, in its official transactions, will not use the only noun available for our species because its use and interpretation are sometimes misunderstood. By implication it would also mean that we are willing to see this fundamentally important word deleted from our language when there is no alternative noun to replace it. I cannot agree to this. Our responsibility as educators is to ensure that our terminology is accurate and precise and, to the best of our ability, ensure that our meaning is understood by those whom we address. Our role is not to facilitate or encourage misguided linguistic surgery because a critically important word is misunderstood and misused in some quarters.

Davies, in the FAUSA document, cites various examples of confusing uses of "man" or "men" that can quite fairly be labelled sexist. In each case the English is sloppy and can be criticised on semantic grounds. The quotation from Jefferson already cited is apparently an example of the third, imprecise use of "men" to mean people. (One must assume that Jefferson did not intend the precise meaning of "males". "Man", the species, does not and cannot have a plural.) It can be assumed that whenever "man" is used in this way, the user has not thought much about what he really intended to say. (If I were to follow a recommendation by Davies, I should have phrased the preceding sentence "... the user has not thought much about what they really intended to say." I am not going to do that either.

Our language would be none the worse for the abandonment of this third use of "man" but it would be seriously impoverished by the loss of either of the other two. Would anthropologists, for example, really be expected to talk about "Neanderthal person"? They would probably prefer to delete him from the records and pretend she never existed. "Man" is also used as a verb, of course, but it could be unwise to attack that. I am far from convinced that the order "staff the pumps!" would find immediate acceptance.

One does not have to be either a psychologist or a political scientist to recognize that one of the major problems of human relations over the whole spectrum from individuals to nations is the misunderstanding and intramusculine communication, an inherent part of which stems from uncertainties in the use of language. The antidiscrimination lobby has done a service by bringing to general attention many of the inadequacies and ambiguities in English and reminding us of the effects, sometime subtle, sometime blunt, that these can have on our social attitudes. If, in turn, this reminder leads to both a lessening of discrimination and more thoughtful and precise channels of communication, then much will have been gained. If, on the other hand, the result is a dismemberment and distortion of English, then we will all lose something and I doubt very much if anyone will benefit.

Dear Faculty and Staff,

My warmest greetings from a fellow American. My name is Jerry R. Moody from the state of Florida in south United States. Currently I am in the U.S. Navy on a seven month Mediterranean Sea deployment. Being at sea enables myself to visit many countries, but unfortunately not Australia. I have heard many wonderful things about your country and I’ve always wanted to visit. A friend of mine on my ship also has the same aspiration to visit this place of paradise, so he and I have made plans to attend college upon completion of our naval enlistment. To better prepare myself for such a venture, I was hoping you could arrange a few student pen pals from your university whom I may contact. I am greatly interested in learning of your country’s styles and cultures, and I believe someone of my interest and age would be better in helping myself develop a basic idea of Australian life styles and customs. In return I would gladly give students of interest information regarding the U.S. in any applicable areas that could be provided. Also if desired, I will send your students a brief autobiography of myself to better know my interest and personality. In closing I would like to add that I am very sincere towards my professional and educational goals and assistance you may provide will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,
OMSN J.R. Moody,

World War II has scarcely disturbed the serene existence of Mildred Fogarty in her lighthouse somewhere off the English coast in 1944. The sudden appearance of her long absent daughter Daphne, her grand-daughter Monica, Daphne’s French lover Pierre, an American undercover agent, two policemen, and the victim of an unspeakable urge, all on the same day, threaten Mildred’s plans for surviving the war. But where is Monica, who is Pierre, what is Adele’s mission, and is Mildred’s husband really Alfred Fogarty, or is Alfred Fogarty really Malcolm Stevenson? And where does Susan Hardcastle fit in?

This comedy-farce by John Scholes is to be published by Samuel French (London) in 1984. It is the most recent of a series of successful plays to be produced by this gifted local writer, and we hope that it will be an entertaining theatrical offering to Wollongong’s 150th Anniversary Programme.
