Rescue public schools not corporate profiteers

Kevin Rudd's vigorous attack upon “extreme capitalism” revealed he does not understand the nature of the current crisis. This is not a meltdown caused purely and simply by rogue traders, bizarre mortgage lending, gross corporate salaries and payouts and, in general, the politics of greed. All those are symptoms of a much more systemic disease. That disease is the ideology of privatisation and deregulation, an ideology Rudd has shown no inclination to buck. This Government's persistent embrace of neoliberal ideology and practice is highlighted by its school funding policy and also its market-driven approach to schooling policy in general.

The shift of funds from public to private schools is part and parcel of a program to strip the public sphere of assets and boost the private sphere. Our languishing public hospitals are another reflection of this perversion of public policy. Even the current rescue package is aimed more at salvaging business and promoting consumerism than it is at building necessary public infrastructure. And that infrastructure does not only involve roads or buildings or alternative energy sources. All these and more are important but it could also involve the arts community as it did in America during the New Deal. Would there even have been the New York School of abstract expressionism but for the fact that artists like Jackson Pollock and Mark Rothko were employed as muralists under the Works Progress Administration? Arts and education should be seen as central to any social and economic reconstruction program. Instead, their funding is whittled away, while the bankers and brokers and boardroom bullies are offered rescue packages.

A bill before parliament now guarantees private schools $28 billion funding for the next four years. The government pledged to keep the thoroughly discredited funding model of the Howard government, a funding model so corrupt that it does not ever obey its own rules and happily hands over money way above entitlements to many wealthy private schools. At a time of financial crisis, the government might have been excused for breaking a pledge and redesigning the funding model. If belts have to tighten, then wealthy private schools should simply be excluded from any funding.
ideology and way of life that helped get us into this mess – the personal acquisitiveness, the class snobbery, the robber baron ethos and born to rule mentality. Accusations of class warfare and the politics of envy would be hurled by the Liberal party but it is the Liberal Party in government that waged class struggle ruthlessly and promoted the politics of envy feverishly.

Just one of the ways it did this was through a schools funding policy that ran down public schools and promoted a proliferatio of private schools. Some of these, funded lavishly by government, are schools of the Exclusive Brethren.

There is a sense in which all private schools are schools of the exclusive brethren but these particular schools are fundamentalist sectarian enclaves that help propagate irrational belief systems (while pretending to teach the curriculum, of course). It is obscene that such schools are able to get any government funding, yet even as he criticises extreme capitalism Rudd stokes the fires of something just as extreme. There is a way for the government to redress the gross imbalance in its school funding policy and that it is to start tipping the scales back to public schools. Public schools need a massive injection of funds and the financial crisis calls out for this sort of strategy. The erosion of our public school system has been a direct product of the ideology that fuelled the financial crisis. Rescuing the public schools rather than the corporate profiteers is an urgent priority.
