Abstract

Mental illness in Australia is one of the leading causes of disability burden with over one million people suffering from depression and over two million living with anxiety disorders. Young adulthood is commonly associated with first-time experiences of mental health problems; the prevalence of mental health problems in young people aged 16-24 years is around one in four. Poignantly, however, young people are also reported to avoid help seeking behaviours for mental health issues because of fear of stigmatisation. ‘There’s nothing mental about seeking help’ is a campus-based social marketing campaign which aims to reduce stigma associated with mental health conditions and increase help-seeking of university students experiencing stress, anxiety and/or depression. This paper describes the formative research undertaken to inform the development of the key messages, strategies and creative concepts currently being used in the project.
